

Digitized by Google

12

History of England

00 TH

FALL OF WOLSEY TO THE DEATH OF ELIZABETH

VOLUME II

FROUDE'S WORKS.

Mistory of England, from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth. Twelve vols., 12mo, gilt top	($,65)
The English in Ireland in the Eighteenth Century. Three vola., 1200,	4-50
Short Studies on Great Subjects. Four vols, 2200, Per
Vol.,	1, 50
Life and Times of Thomas Backet. 22mo, paper,	.50
Cantata A Sketcha zemo, gilt top,	F-50
Luther. A Short Biography. Cloth, 75 cts. Paper,	- 30
Thomas Carlyle. Library Edition. Four vola., 3vo,	₹.oo
Cheaper Edition. Two vols., 12mo,	3-00
Jane Weish Carlyle. Letters and Memorials of, Library
Edition. Two vols., 8vo,	4.00
Cheaper Edition. One vol., 11mo,	1.50
Thomas Carlyle. Reminiscences by. 8vo,	0.50
Cheaper Edition. 10mo,	1.50
Oceanna, England and Her Colonies, Ilins, Crown 8vo, .	1.75
The English in the West Indies; or, The Bow of Ulysses.
Illus, Crown Bro,	7.75
The Divorce of Catherine of Aragon, 8vo,	B, j o
The Spanish Story of the Armade, and other Essays. 1200,	1.50
The Life and Letters of Emanus. 8vo,	2.50

HISTORY OF ENGLAND

PROM

THE FALL OF WOLSEY

TO

THE DEATH OF ELIZABETH

JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE

VOLUME II

pew york
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS 1895

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

CHAPTER VI.

THE PROTESTANTS.

				1400
The Lollards		•		16
Presentation to Religious Benefices	in.	the	Fourteenth
Century		-		17
Statutes of Provisors				21
Rise of the Lollards				25
John Wycliffe	-			26
Theory of Property				28
Insurrection of Wat Tyler				29
Wycliffe's Influence declines				80
Death of Wycliffe	+	æ		81
Insurrection of Oldenstie				34
Close of the Lollard Movement .	+	,		35
New Birth of Protestantism				37
The Christian Brothers				86
Luther	٠.			89
Multiplication of Testaments				40
William Tyndal	-			41
The Antwerp Printing-Press				42
The Christian Brothers				43
Welsey's Persecutions				49
Story of Anthony Dalaber	٠.			57
Escape of Garret				69
Perplexity of the Authorities	٠.			70
The Ports are set for Garret's Capture	, '	٠.	· . · .	71
Garret goes to Bristol, and is taken .	•	. "		71
The Investigation at Oxford				78
THE WATER BOTH OF CALLE I	1

્જે

- Google

CONTENTS.

	多本 值
Doctor London's Intercession	7
The Bishop of Lincoln	74
Oxford is Purged	71
Temper of the Protestants	77
The Fall of Wolsey brings no Relief	74
Sir Thomas More as Chancellor	. 71
Contrast between Wolsey and More	84
Martyrdom of Bilney	. 61
Martyrdom of James Bainham	96
Feelings of the People	9.
Pavier the Town Clerk	91
The Worship of Relies	94
Roods and Relies	91
The Rood of Dovercourt	₽6
The Paladins	91
Early Life of Latimer	91
He goes to Cambridge	100
Latimer's Education	101
His Fame as a Preacher	109
He is appointed Chaplain to the King	103
His Defence of the Protestants	104
He is cited before the Bishops	104
Latimer before the Bishops	101
Thomas Cromwell	104
Will of Thomas Cromwell	114
CHAPTER VII.
THE LAST EFFORTS OF DIPLOMACY.
Mary of Hungary	125
The King is cited to Rome	123
Clement refuses further Delay	128
Isolation of England	129
Heary argent against the Interview	100
He appeals to a Council	131
Terms of the Appeal	134
Legal Value of the Appeal	136
Cranmer's Sentence known at Rome	121
Measures of the Consistory	122

	UAR
Henry again calls on Francis	4
He will not surrender his Marriage	14
He will not repeal his Legislation	. 14
He arges the Rupture of the Interview	143
Recal of the Embassy	. 14
England and Germany	143
Birth of Elizabeth	. 143
Clement arrives at Marseilles	150
The Interview	. 15
Bonner at Marseilles	18.
Bonner and the Pope	. 18
The Pope rejects the Appeal	15
Proposal for a Court to sit at Cambray	. 15
Francis implores Henry to consent	15
Henry refuses to revoke the Laws against the Papacy	. 160
State of England	169
The Princess Mary	. 16
Queen Catherine	163
The Num of Kent	. 170
State of Feeling in England	178
Proposed Marriage of the Princess Mary	. 161
The Num of Kent	183
Diagrace of Mary	. 18
The Countess of Salisbury	186
The Nevilles	. 183
General Superstition	1,9 Proposals for a Protestant League used as a Menace to)
France	. 195
The Protestant League	19:
The Court of Brussels	. 196
Meeting of Parliament	197
Perils of the Reformation	198
Cromwell	199
Opening Measures	200
The Congé d'Élire	201
Abolition of Exactions	. 204
Closing Protest	200
Apology of Sir Thomas More accepted by the King .	206
Obstinate Defence of Fisher	206

CONTENTS.

ŀΥ

The Bill proceeds

209

Execution of the Nun															PAGE
Her last Words	•		•		4				•		•		٠		AIG
The Act of Succession		-		•		Ŀ		٠				٠		*	211
		_	•		٠				•		٠		۰		211
The first Oath of Allegia				•				F4		•		•		•	216
Clement gives final Sen					H	WH	i A	JD			١		•		213
Obscurity of the Pope's Mission of the Duke of (uci	•		•		•		•					222
			ä		•		•		•		•				223
The French Fleet watel								٠		•		٠			224
The Commission sate to a	rec	e1 7	9 E	ne	U	alb	•		•				•		998
More and Fisher .		•		•		•		•		•		٠			226
More before the Commu	, ik	E	•				•		•		٠		·		227
He refuses to Swear		•		•		-		٠		•		•			228
Debate in Council .	•				٠				•		•		•		229
The Government are pe	TE	mp	m	y		*		*		•		•		*	230
Concession not possible	٠		٠		٠		4				٠		•		251
Royal Proclamation .		-		•		٠		٠		•		٠		٠	232
Circular to the Shariffs	4		•		•				•		•		#		233
Death of Clement VII.				٠		•		•		•		٠			236
THE	ß I	RIE	3.85	RI	RÐ	BL.	LIC	M.
State of Ireland .													_		237
The Norman Conquest	Ť		-	ı			_		•		-		•		200
Absentees		_	_	Ť		•		Ť				•		Ť	239
The Norman Irish .	Ť				•				•				·		241
Weakness of the English	h F	Ruh	A	-		-	_	•		-				-	241
Distribution of the Irish					•		Ť				Ì				249
The Irish Reaction .			١.	•	4					•					251
Condition of the People	-		Ī							_					253
English and Irish Estima	ate	8	ı,	-	4										254
Ireland for the Irish .			-												255
Coyne and Livery .											,				Mod
The Geraldines of Kilds	ire			ă.		٠									257
Deputation of Lord Sur				_		_			,	-					261
Return of Kildare	•			,											268
Foreign Intrigues .					4		_								160
Demond intrigues with	th	e I) Japan	per	rogr									٠	267
Geralduna Commissioner															900

	ı
_	ľ
•	П
-0	П

CONTENTS.

											P440
Kildare sent to the Tower .											270
The Irish Rise											271
The Duke of Richmond Vicercy	,									,	272
Third Deputation to Kildare .											278
Ireland in its Ideal State .											274
New Aspects of Irish Rebellion					*		ı		,		275
Ireland and the Papacy .											276
Kildare is sent to the Tower .		_									277
Desmond and the Emperor											278
Corny O'Brien		_									279
The Holy War of the Geraldine	20										280
General Rebellion		_	_								DID.
Siege of Dublin											282
Murder of Archbishop Allen .							,				284
Fitzgerald writes to the Pope				_							0000
Dublin saved by the Earl of Ora	EOI	ıd							,		U.S.
A Truce agreed to						,					287
Delay of the English Deputy .									,		988
Ormand again saves Dublin						·					289
The Deputy sails from Beauman	i										290
Mismanagement of Skeffington											291
Delay and Incapacity									Ŀ		292
Burning of Trim and Dunboyne											202
Skeffington will not move .			,		,						294
General Despondency	_							,			295
Disorganization of the English	Arm	y			_						296
The Campaign opens	+	7				4		÷			291
Siege of Maynooth											107
Storming of the Castle .								,			200
The Pardon of Maynooth .					٠						300
The Rebellion collapses .	,										501
Lord Leonard Grey											301
Fitzgorald surrenders	,					,					808
Dilemma of the Government					4			-			3-04
Rescution of Fitzgerald		-					_				308
End of the Rebellion											304

CHAPTER IX.

THE CATROLIC MARTYRS.

									7 A III
State of England in 1534		٠							301
Temper of the Clergy							h		308
Order for Preaching								,	310
Secret Disaffection among the Clergy	٠				•		,		313
The Confessional						4		,	311
Treasonable Intrigues	+		•		v				817
Catholie Treasons						-8			818
Persecuting Laws against the Catholics									819
The Act of Supremacy				,					322
The Oath of Allegiance					5				226
Election of Paul the Third								p.	328
Anxiety of the Emperor							,		880
Proposals for a Catholic Coalition								ė	331
Counter-Overtures of Francis to Henry									332
Attitude of Henry		ï		,		4		a	833
Distrust of France	#						į.		335
England and the Papacy									336
The Penal Laws					ï		į.		887
The Battle of the Faiths									338
The Charterhouse Monks									339
The Anabaptist Martyrs									35-7
Fisher and More		,					ŀ	"	359
Fisher named Cardinal				ė					864
The Pope condescends to Falsahoud			_						865
Fisher Tried and Sentenced		į.							366
Execution of Fisher		-		Ī		•			367
Sir Thomas More	-			,	_				368
Effect upon Europe		_							877
Letter to Cassalis	_			į.			•		382
Reply of the Pope									385
Bull of Deposition	-		-		_				3%6
Intrigues of Francis in Germany .						7			2H8
England and Germany				,					896
5.4

CHAPTER X.

THE VISITATION OF THE MONASTERIES.

				PAGE
Visitation of the Monasteries	-			396
The Abbey of St. Albans	-			402
Commission of 1535				107
The Visitors at Oxford			•	409
Progress of the Visitors	+			418
Visit to Langden Abbey	•	4		415
Fountains Abbey				417
The Monks at Fordham		•		419
The Monks of Pershore	-			491
	•			423
The Black Book in Parliament	-0			427
Discussion in Parhament				429
Conflicting Opinions	4	4		431
Smaller Houses suppressed	•		-	433
The Protestant Bishops				485
State of London	•		1	487
The Vagrant Act	40			489
Bemission of Firstfruite				840
Desolution of Parliament				441
The Work accomplished by Parliament .				442
CHAPTER XL
TRIAL AND DEATH OF ANNE BOL	EYN	4
Don't of Orese Casherine
Death of Queen Catherine	•			448
Anne Boleyn		•	•	446
Anne Boleyn committed to the Tower	•	•		454
The Tower		•	•	457
Cranmer's Letter to the King.	*	•		459
Cranmer's Postscript			•	461
Preparations for the Trial	•	-		468
True Bills found by the Grand Juries ,	,	•	•	469
The Indictment				470

The Trials ,

The opposite Probabilities

zīv

CONTENTS.

						PAGE
Execution of the five Gentlemen	ı.					483
The Divorce						484
The Execution		•				486
The Succession					_	488
The King's Third Marriage	ı.					490
Opinions of Foreign Courts .						491
Meeting of Parliament	r					492
Speech of the Lord Chancellor						493
Becond Act of Succession						495

CHAPTER VI.

THE PROTESTANTS.

Warra changes are about to take place of great and radaring moment, a kind of prologue, on a small scale, sometimes anticipates the true opening of the drama; the the first drops which give notice of the coming storm, or as if the shadows of the reality were projected forwards into the future, and imitated in dumb thou the movements of the real actors in the story.

Such a rehearsal of the English Reformation was witnessed at the close of the fourteenth century, confused, imperfect, disproportioned, to the fourteenth containing a representative of each one of tury.

the mixed forces by which that great change was ultimately effected, and foreshadowing even something of the course which it was to run.

There was a quarrel with the pope upon the extent of the papal privileges; there were disputes between the laity and the clergy, —accompanied, as if involuntarily, by attacks on the sacramental system and the Catholic faith, — while innovation in doctrine was accompanied also with the tendency which characterized the extrone development of the later Protestants—towards political republicanism, the fifth monarchy, and community of goods. Some account of this movement must be given in this place, although it can be but a sketch only. "Lollardry" has a history of its own; The Lemma but it forms no proper part of the history of form unnerti. the Reformation. It was a separate phenot inthern, nomenon, provoked by the same causes which produced their true fruit at a later period; but it formed no portion of the stem on which those fruits ultimately grew. It was a prelude which was played out, and sank into silence, answering for the time ac other end than to make the name of heretic odions in the ears of the English nation. In their recoil from their first failure, the people stamped their hatred of heterodoxy into their language; and in the word miscreant, misbeliever, as the synonym of the worst species of reprobate, they left an indelible record of the popular estimate of the followers of John Wyeliffe.

The Lollard story opens with the disputes between the crown and the see of Rome on the presentation to English benefices. For the hundred and fifty years which succeeded the Conquest, the right of nominating the archbishops, the bishops, and the mitred abbots, had been claimed and exercised by the crown. Courses On the passing of the great charter, the the mode of church had recovered its liberties, and the privilege of free election had been conceded by a special clause to the clergy. The practice which then became established was in accordance with the general spirit of the English constitution. On the vacancy of a see, the cathedral chapter applied to the trown for a congé d'élire. The application was a form; the consent was invariable. A bishop was then elected by a majority of suffrages; his name was submitted to the metropolitan, and by him to the pope. If the pope signified his approval, the election was complete; consecration followed; and the bishop having been furnished with his bulls of investiture, was presented to the king, and from him received "the temporalities" of his see. The mode in which the great abbots were chosen was precisely similar; the superiors Bight of the of the orders to which the abbeys belonged election don were the channels of communication with the great charten pope, in the place of the archbishops; but "elliptons the elections in themselves were free, and bearer were conducted in the same manner. The smaller church benefices, the small monasteries or parish churches, were in the hands of private patrons, lay or ecclesiastical; but in the case of each institution a reference was admitted, or was supposed to be admitted, to the court of Rome.

The origin of the word Lollards has been always a disputed question.
I conceive it to be from Lollam. They were the "tures" in the corn of Catholicism.

There was thus in the pope's hand an authority of an indefinite kind, which it was presumed that his sacred office would forbid him to abuse, but which, however, if he so unfortunately pleased, he might abuse at his discretion. He had absolute power over every nomination to an English benefice; he might privilege of refuse his consent till such adequate reasons, the pope at a material or spiritual, as he considered sufficient to induce him to acquiesce, had been dead in the control to submitted to his consideration. In the case elections. of nominations to the religious houses, the superiors of the various orders residing abroad had equal facilities for obstructiveness; and the consequence of so large a confidence in the purity of the higher orders of the Church became visible in an act of *parliament which it was found necessary to pass in 1306-7.1

1 15 Ed. I.; Statutes of Carliele, cap. 1-4.

701 . IL

" Of late," says this act, " it has come to the knowledge of the king, by the grievous complaint of the honourable persons, lords, and other noblemen of his realm, that whereas monasteries, priories, and Act to pre-Tent the su-periors resi-dent abroad other religious houses were founded to the honour and glory of God, and the advancefrom laying ment of holy church, by the king and his progenitors, and by the said noblemen and their ancestors; and a very great portion of lands and tenements have been given by them to the said monasteries, priories, and religious houses, and the religious men serving God in them; to the intent that clerks and laymen might be admitted in such houses, and that sick and feeble folk might be maintained, hospitality, almsgiving, and other charitable deeds might be done, and prayers be said for the souls of the founders and their heirs; the abbots, priors, and governors of the said houses, and cortain aliens their superiors, as the abbots and priors of the Cistertians, the Premonstrants, the orders of Saint Augustine and of Saint Benedict, and many more of other religions and orders have at their own pleasure set divers heavy, unwonted heavy and importable tallages, payments, and impositions upon every of the said monasteries and houses subject unto them, in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, without the privity of the king and his nobility, contrary to the laws and customs of the said realm; and thereby the number of religious persons being oppressed by such talkges, payments, and impositions, the service of God is diminished, alms are not given to the poor, the sick, and the feeble; the healths of the living and the souls of the dead be miserably defrauded; hospitality, alms-giving, and other godly deeds do cease; and so that which in times past was charitably given to godly uses and to the service of God, is now converted to an evil end, by permission whereof there groweth great scandal to the people." To provide against a continuance of these abuses, it was enacted that no "religious" persons should, under any pretence or form, send out of the kingdom any kind of rent, tax, or tallage; and that "priors aliens" should not presume to assess any payment, charge, or other burden whatever upon houses within the realm.

The language of this act was studiously guarded. The pope was not alluded to; the specific methods by which the extortion was practised were not explained; the tax upon presentations to benefices, either having not yet distinguished itself beyond other impositions, or the government trusting that a measure of this general kind might answer the desired end. Lucrative encroachments, however, do not yield so easily to treat ment; nearly fifty years after it became necessary to reënact the same statute; and while recapitulating the provisions of it, the parliament found it desirable to point out more specifically the intention with which it was passed.

The popes in the interval had absorbed in their turn from the heads of the religious orders, the privileges which by them had been exterted from the affiliated societies. Each English benefice had become the fountain of a rivulet which flowed into the Roman exchequer, or a property to be distributed as the private patronage of the Roman bishop: and the English par liament for the first time found itself in collision with the Father of Christendom.

"The pope," says the fourth of the twenty-fifth of Edward III., "accroaching to himself the signories

1 86 Ed. L cap. 1-4.

of the benefices within the realm of England, doth give and grant the same to alk na which did never Statute of provisors for-oldding the dwell in England, and to cardinals which the poper to could not dwell here, and to others as well present to be settless in aliens as denizens, whereby manifold incon-Ingland. veniences have ensued." 44 Not regarding" the statute of Edward I., he had also continued to present to bishopricks, abbeys, priories, and other valuable preferments: money in large quantities was carried out of the realm from the proceeds of these offices, and it was necessary to insist emphatically that the papal nominations should cease. They were made in violation of the law, and were conducted with simony so flagrant that English benefices were sold in the papal courts to any person who would pay for them, whether an Englishman or a stranger. It was therefore decreed that the elections to bishopricks should be free as in time past, that the rights of patrons should be preserved, and penalties of imprisonment, forfeiture, or optlawry, according to the complexion of the offence, should be attached to all impetration of benefices from Rome by purchase or otherwise.1

If statute law could have touched the evil, these enactments would have been sufficient for the purpose; but the influence of the popes in England was of that subtle kind which was not so readily defeated. The
The statute law was still defied, or still evaded; and the allow struggle continued till the close of the cenad in fruit across. tury, the legislature labouring patiently, but

1 25 Ed. III stat. 5. A clause in the preamble of this act beers a significantly Eraction complexions come exists Eglisc satisfaces of mode on estat de prelocie deins le voyantes. Dengleterre par le dit Ros et ses progenitoires, et courtes, barons, et mbles de ce Registime et lours ancestres, pour eux et le popule enfinermer de la les Dien. If the Church of England was held to have been founded not by the succession of the Apostles, but by the king and the notice, the chine of Henry VIII, to the supremacy was precisely in the rei it of the constitution.

meffectually, to confine with fresh enactments their ingenious adversary.¹

At length symptoms appeared of an intention on the part of the popes to maintain their claims the popes with spiritual censures, and the nation was obliged to resolve upon the course which, in the event of their resorting to that extremity, it would follow. The lay lords and the House of Commons found no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion. They passed a fresh penal statute with prohibitions even more emphatically stringent, and decided the partitional that if any man brought into this realm any sentence, summons, or excommunication, containing the real incur pain of life and members, with forfeit that the of goods; and if any prelate made execution of such sentence, his temporalities should be taken from him, and should abide in the king's hands till redress was made."

So bold a measure threatened nothing less than open rupture. The act, however, seems to have been passed in haste, without determined consideration; and on second thoughts, it was held more prudent to attempt a 4 13 Ric. II. stat. 2.

^{2 36} Ed. III. stat. 2, 2 Ric. II. cap. 2, 18 Ric. II. cap. 15, 12 Ric. II. stat. 2. The first of these acts centains a paragraph which shifts the blame from the popes themselves to the officials of the Roman courts. The statute is said to have been enacted an side at confort du pape qui moult sovent a source trubles per tieles at semblables clamours at impetracions, at qui y meist voluntiers covenable remedie, at an seyntwice entoit our cas choose enfournes. I had regarded this passage as a fiction of courtesy like that of the Long Parisament who levied troops in the name of Charles I. The suspicious omissions of the clause, however, in the translation of the statutes which was made in the later years of Henry VIII., ustifies an interpretation more favourable to the intentions of the popes.

The abbote and bishops decently protested. Their protest was read in parliament, and entered on the Rolls. Rot. Part. HI. [251] quoted by Lingard, who has given a full account of them transactions.

and the same of the same of

milder course. The strength of the opposition to the papacy lay with the Commons. 1 When the session of parliament was over, a great council was sum-A "great erworll" admoned to reconsider what should be done, dresses the pope, with a desire for an and an address was drawn up, and forwarded BITTA LIGHT to Rome, with a request that the then reignment ing pope would devise some manner by which the difficulty could be arranged. Boniface IX. replied with the same want of judgment which was shown afterwards on an analogous occasion by Clement VII. He disbelieved the danger; and daring the government to persevere, he granted a prebendal stall at Wells to an Italian cardinal, to which a presentation had been made already by the king. Opposing suits were instantly instituted between the claimants in the courts of the The question two countries. A decision was given in Eng-I brought to land in favour of the nominee of the king, an bune by the ageomand the bishops agreeing to support the crown munication were excommunicated.8 The court of Rome had resolved to try the issue by a struggle of force, and the government had no alternative but to surrender at discretion, or to persevere at all hazards, and resist the usurpation.

The proceedings on this occasion seem to have been unusual, and significant of the importance of the crisis. Parl'ament either was sitting at the time when the excommunication was issued, or else it was immediately assembled; and the House of

⁴ Sec 16 Ric. II cap. 5.

^{*} This it will be remembered was the course which was efforwards followed by the parliament under Henry VIII. before abelishing the payment of first-fruits.

I lingard mys, that "there were ramours that if the prelates executed the decree of the king's courts, they would be excoramunicated." — Vol. III. p. 172. The language of the set of partiament, 18 Ric. II. cap. 5, 4 emphorit that the sentence was pronounced.

Commons drew up, in the form of a petition to the king, a declaration of the circumstances which had occurred. After having stated generally the English law on the presentation to benefices, " Now of late," they added, "divers processes be made by his Holmess the Pope, and censures of excommunication upon certain bishops, because they have made execution of the judgments [given in the king's courts], to the open disherison of the crown; whereby, if remedy be not provided, the crown of England, which hath been so free at all times, that it has been in no earthly subjection, should be submitted to the pope; and the laws and statutes of the realm by him be defeated and avoided at his will, in perpetual destruction of the sovereignty of the king our lord, his crown, his regality, and all his realm." The Commons, therefore, on their part, declared, The Horses of Commons of Commons of Commons declared their that the things so attempted were clearly declare that they will against the king's crown and his regulity, used the Crown to and approved of in the time of all his progenitors, and therefore they and all the liege commons of the realm would stand with their said lord the king. and his said crown, in the cases aforesaid, to live and die," 1 Whether they made allusion to the act of 1889 does not appear, - a measure passed under protest from one of the estates of the realm was possibly held unequal to meet the emergency, - at all events they would not tely upon it. For after this peremptory as- and desire sertion of their own opinion, they desired the standles the king, " and required him in the way of jus- to-the sphile. tice," to examine severally the lords spiritual sort they will and temporal how they thought, and how they would stand. The examination was made, and the result was satisfactory. The lay lords replied without reservation that they would support the crown. The bishops (they were in a difficulty for which all The by lorde allowance must be made) gave a cautious, but also a manly answer. They would not rectly, and the spiritual affirm, they said, that the pope had a right to lords ladirectly, to the excommunicate them in such cases, and they With the would not say that he had not. It was clear, however, that legal or illegal, such excommunication was against the privileges of the English crown, and therefore that, on the whole, they would and aught to be with the crown, loialment, like loyal subjects, as they were bound by their allegiance.1

3 M Rio, Ill. cap. &

* Bad.

In this unusual and emphatic manner, the three estates agreed that the pope should be resisted; and an act passed "that all persons suing at the court of Rome, and obtaining thence any bulls, instruments, sentences of excommunication which touched the king, or were against him, his regality, or his realm, and they which prought the same within the realm, or received the same, or made thereof notification, or any other execution whatever, within the realm or without, they, their notaries, procurators, maintainers and abettors, fautors and counsellors, should be put out of the king's protection, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, be forfeited."

The resolute attitude of the country terminated the struggle. Beniface prudently yielded, and for the moment, and indeed for ever under this especial form, the wave of papal encroachment was rolled back. The temper which had been roused in the contest might perhaps have carried the nation further. The liberties of the crown had been asserted successfully. The analogous liberties of the church might have followed; and other channels, too, might have been cut off, through which the papal exchequer fed itself on English blood. But at this crisis the anti-Roman policy was arrested in its course by another movement, which turned the current of suspicion, and frightened back the nation to conservatism.

¹ 14 Elc. II. cap. 8.

While the crown and the parliament had been engaged with the pope, the undulations of the Analogous appearing the dispute had penetrated down among the body of the people, and an agitation had been commenced of an analogous kind against the spirition of the truly against the spirition of the spirition of the truly against the spirition of the spirition of the truly against the spirition of the spirition of the truly against the spirition of the

This form of discontent found its exponent in John Wycliffe, the great forerunner of the Reformation, whose austere figure stands out above Wyalife. the crowd of notables in English history, with an out line not unlike that of another forerunner of a greater change.

The early life of Wycliffe is obscure. Lewis, on the authority of Leland, says that he was He early born near Richmond, in Yorkshire. Fuller, career. though with some hesitation, prefers Durham. He emerges into distinct notice in 1360, ten years subsequent to the passing of the first Statute of Provisors, Lowis, Life of Wyeliffe.

If such scientia media might be allowed to man, which is beseeth our taking and above conjecture, such should I call our persuasion that he was been in Durham. — Fuller's Worthies, Vol. I. p. 479.

having then acquired a great Oxford reputation as a lecturer in divinity, and having earned for himself powerful friends and powerful enemies. He had made his name distinguished by attacks upon the clergy for their indolence and profligacy: attacks both written and orally delivered, - those, written, we observe, being written in English, not in Latin. In 1365, Islip, Archbishop of Cantorbury, appointed him Warden of Canterbury Hall; the appointment, however, was made with some irregularity, and the following year, Archbishop Islip dying, his successor, Langham, deprived Wychffe, and the sentence was confirmed by the king. It seemed, nevertheless, that no personal reflection was intended by this decision, for Edward III. nominated the ex-warden one of his chaplains immediately after, and employed him on an important mission to Bruges, where a conference on the benefice question was to be held with a papel commission.

Other church preferment was subsequently given to Wycliffe; but Oxford remained the chief scene of his work. He continued to hold his professorship of divinity; and from this office the character of his history took its complexion. At a time when books were rare and difficult to be procured, lecturers who had truth to communicate fresh drawn from the fountain, held an influence which in these days it is as difficult to ima influence which in these days it is as difficult to ima increase, however, it is impossible to verrate. Students from all Europe flocked to the feet of a celebrated professor, who became the leader of a party by the mere fact of his position.

The burden of Wycliffe's teaching was the exposure of the indolent fictions which passed under the name of religion in the established theory of the church. He was a man of most simple life; austere in appearance, with bare feet and russet mantle.1 As a Simplicity of soldier of Christ, he saw in his Great Master and his Apostles the patterns whom he was bound to imitate. By the contagion of example he gathered about him other men who thought as he did; and gradually, under his captaincy, these " poor priests," as The pers they were called - vowed to poverty because prime. Christ was poor - vowed to accept no benefice, lest they should misspend the property of the poor, at I because, as apostles, they were bound to go where their Master called them. spread out over the country as an army of missionaries, to preach the faith which they found in the Bible - to preach, not of relics Hadosand of indulgences, but of repentance and of the grace of God. They carried with The transthem copies of the Bible which Wycliffe had Bible. translated, leaving here and there, as they travelled, their costly treasures, as shining seed points of light; and they refused to recognise the authority of the bishops, or their right to silence them.

¹ The Last Age of the Churck was written in 1356. See Lawis, p. 5.

If this had been all, and perhaps if Edward III. had been succeeded by a prince less miserably incapable than his grandson Richard, Wycliffe might have made good his ground; the movement of the parliament against the pope might have united in a common stream with the spiritual move against the church at home, and the Reformation have been antedated by a century. He was summoned to answer for himself before the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1377. He appeared in court supported by the presence of John of Relia pres Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, the eldest of Line af Edward's surviving sons, and the authorities were unable to strike him behind so powerful a shield.

Lelend

Lowis, p. 987.

But the "poor priests" had other doctrines besides those which they discovered in the Bible, relating to subjects with which, as apostles, they would have done better if they had shrunk from meddling. The inefficiency of the clergy was occasioned, as Wycliffe thought, by their wealth and by their luxury.

He desired to save them from a temptation too heavy for them to bear, and he insisted that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of detection to be a save that he resolved of the save that he resolved of that by neglect of duty their wealth had been forfeited, and that it was the business of the laity to take it from its unworthy possessors. The invectives with which the argument was accompanied produced a widely-spread irritation. The reins of the country fell simultaneously into the weak hands of Richard II., and the consequence was a rapid spread of disorder. In the year which followed Richard's accession, consistory judges were assaulted in their courts, sanctuaries were violated, priests were attacked and ill-treated in church, churchyard, and cathedral, and even while enmaged in the mass; 1 the contagion of the growing anarchy seems to have touched even Wycliffe himself, and touched him in a point most deeply dangerous.

His theory of property, and his study of the characrestriction ter of Christ, had led him to the near conbeginn fines of Anabaptism. Expanding his views upon the estates of the church into an axiom, he taught theory of that "charters of perpetual inheritance were the tenure of property. impossible; " "that God could not give men civil possessions for ever;" " that property was

- 1

^{1 1} Ric. II cap. 18.

^{*} Welsingham, 208-7, apad Lingard. It is to be observed, however, that Wychife himself limited his arguments strictly to the property of the clergy. See Milman's History of Latin Christianity, Vol. V. p. 106.

founded in grace, and derived from God; " and "seeing that forfeiture was the punishment of treason, and all sin was treason against God, the sinner must consequently forfeit his right to what he held of God." These propositions were nakedly true, as we shall most of us allow; but God has his own methods of enforcing extreme principles; and human legislation may only meddle with them at its pend. The theory as an abstraction could be represented as applying equally to the laity as to the clergy, and the new teaching received a practical comment in 1381, in the invasion of London by Wat, the tyler of Dart- Wat Tyler's ford, and 100,000 men, who were to level intersection. all ranks, put down the church, and establish universal liberty. Two priests accompanied the insurgents, not Wycliffe's followers, but the licentious counterfeits of them, who trod inevitably in their footsteps, and were as inevitably countenanced by their doctrines. insurrection was attended with the bloodshed, destruction, and ferocity natural to such outbreaks. Archbishop of Canterbury and many gentlemen were murdered; and a great part of London sacked and burnt. It would be absurd to attribute this disaster to Wycl.ffe, nor was there any desire to hold him responsible for it; but it is equally certain that the American doctrines which he had taught were incomneut on Wychille's patible, at that particular time, with an effectmentag. ive repression of the spirit which had caused the explosion. It is equally certain that he had brought discredit on his nobler efforts by ambiguous language on a subject of the utmost difficulty, and had taught the wiser and better portion of the people to confound heterodoxy of opinion with sedition, anarchy, and disorder

¹ Walsingham p. $75, apud Lingard.

So long as Wycliffe lived, his own lofty character was a guarantee for the conduct of his immediate disciples; and although his favour had far declined, a party in the state remained attached to him, with sufficient influence to prevent the adoption of extreme measures against the "poor priests." In the Measure for the represyear following the insurrection, an act was passed for their repression in the House of Lords, and was sent down by the king to the They were spoken of as "evil persons," going from place to place in defiance of the bishops, preaching in the open air to great congregations at markets and fairs, "exciting the people," "engendering discord between the estates of the realm." The ordinaries had no power to silence them, and had therefore desired that commissions should be issued to the sheriffs of the various counties, to arrest all such persons, and confine them, until they would " justify themselves" in the ecclesiastical courts.1 Wyc-Rejected by the Comliffe petitioned against the bill, and it was mons as rejected; not so much perhaps out of tenderness for the reformer, as because the Lower House was excited by the controversy with the pope; and being doubtfully disposed towards the clergy, was reluctant to subject the people to a more stringent spiritual control.

But Wycliffe himself meanwhile had received a clear intimation of his own declining position. His opposition to the church authorities, and his efforts at reinvigorating the faith of the country, had led him into doubtful statements on the nature of the eucharist; he had entangled himself in dubious metaphysics on a subject on which no middle course is really possible; and being summoned to answer for his language before a synod in London, he had thrown himself again for protection on the Duke of Lancaster. The wycliffs aduke (not unnaturally under the circumstances) declined to encourage what he could he make his submit neither approve nor understand; and Wycliffs, by his great patron's advice, submitted. He read a confession of faith before the bishops, which was held ratisfactory; he was forbidden, however, to and the preach again in Oxford, and retired to his last. living of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, where two years later he died.

5 Sic. II. sap.)

With him departed all which was best and purest in the movement which he had commenced. The zeal of his followers was not extinguished, but the wisdom was extinguished which had directed it; and perhaps the being treated as the enemies of order had itself a tendency to make them what they were believed to They were left unmolested for the next wreling twenty years, the feebleness of the govern- continue on molested till ment, the angry complexion which had been the niveles a tion of 1480 assumed by the dispute with Rome, and the when they political anarchy in the closing decade of the the ban as century, combining to give them temporary of order. melter; but they availed themselves of their opportunity to travel further on the dangerous road on which they had entered; and on the settlement of the country under Henry IV. they fell under the general ban which struck down all parties who had shared in the late disturbances.

They had been spared in 1382, only for more sharp denunciation, and a more cruel fate; and Boniface having healed, on his side, the wounds which had been

1 Wilkins, Concibe, III. 160-167.

by well-timed concessions, there was no reason left for leniency. The character of the Lollard teaching was thus described (perhaps in somewhat exaggerated language) in the preamble of the act of 1401.

"Divers false and perverse people," so runs the act 34 4 Rest De Heretico comburendo, " of a certain new sect, damnably thinking of the faith of the sacraments of the church, and of the authority of the same, against the law of God and of the church, usurping the office of preaching, do perversely and maliciously, in divers places within the realm, preach and teach divers new doctrines, and wicked erroneous opinto the faith and determination the teaching of Holy Church. And of such sect and wicked doctrines they make unlawful conventicles, they hold and exercise schools, they make and write books, they do wickedly instruct and inform people, and excite and stir them to sedition and insurrection. and make great strife and division among the people, and other enormities horrible to be heard, daily do perpetrate and commit. The diocesans cannot by their jurisdiction spiritual, without aid of the King's Majesty, sufficiently correct these said false and perverse people, nor refrain their malice, because they do go from diocess to diocess, and will not appear before the said diocesans; but the jurisdiction spiritual, the keys of the church, and the censures of the same, do utterly contemn and despise; and so their wicked preachings and doctrines they do from day to day continue and exercise, to the destruction of all order and rule, right and reason."

Remething of these violent accusations is perhaps 1 De Rarelles conferench. 2 Hen. 1V. esp. 15.

due to the horror with which false doctrine in matters of faith was looked upon in the Catholic church, the grace by which alone an honest life was made possible being held to be dependent upon orthodoxy. But the Lollards had become political revolutionists as well as religious reformers; the revolt against the spiritual authority had encouraged and countenanced a revolt against the secular; and we cannot be surprised, therefore, that these institutions should have sympathized with each other, and have united to repress a danger which was formidable to both.

The bishops, by this act, received arbitrary ower to arrest and imprison on suspicion, without check or restraint of law, at their will and the bishops of arresting pleasure. Prisoners who refused to abjure their controlling errors, who persisted in heresy, or relapsed into it after abjuration, were sentenced to be burnt at the stake, — a dreadful punishment, on the wickedness of which the world has long been happily agreed. Yet we must remember that those who condemned teachers of heresy to the flames, considered that orthodox hereay itself involved everlasting perdition; that they were but faintly imitating the severity which orthodoxy still ascribes to Almighty God Himself.

The tide which was thus setting back in favour of the church did not yet, however, flow freely, and without a check. The Commons consented to sacrifice the heretics, but they still cast wistful looks on the Competition the lands of the religious houses. On two her Crown for several occasions, in 1406, and again 1410, then of church people and representations were made upon the subject to the king. The country, too, continued to be agitated with was and treason; and when Henry V. became king, in 1412, the church was still uneasy, and the Ready V. Lollards were as dangerous as ever. Whether by prudent conduct they might have secured a repeal of the persecuting act is uncertain; it is more likely, from their conduct, that they had made their existence incompatible with the security of any tolerable government.

1 Btow, 880, 838.

THE R.

A rumour having gone abroad that the king intended to enforce the laws against heresy, notices were found fixed against the doors of the London churches, that if any such measure was attempted, a hundred thousand men would be in arms to oppose it. papers were traced to Sir John Oldcastle, otherwise called Lord Cobham, a man whose true character is Insurrection more difficult to distinguish, in the conflict of the evidence which has come down to us about him, than that of almost any noticeable person in history. He was perhaps no worse than a fanatic. He was certainly prepared, if we may trust the words of a royal proclamation (and Henry was personally intimate with Oldcastle, and otherwise was not likely to have exaggerated the charges against him), he was prepared to venture a rebellion, with the prospect of himself becoming the president of some possible Lollard commonwealth. The king, with swift decigiveness, annihilated the incipient treason. Oldcastle was himself arrested. He escaped out of the Tower into Scotland; and while Henry was absent in France he seems to have attempted to organize some kind of Scotch invasion; but he was soon after again Oldonstie taken on the Welsh Border, tried and executed. An act which was passed in 1414 described his proceedings as an "attempt to destroy the rest set king, and all other manner of estates of the harm." realm as well spiritual as temporal, and also all manner of policy, and finally the laws of the land." The sedition was held to have originated in heresy, and for the better repression of such mischiefs in time to come, the lord chancellor, the judges, the justices of the peace, the sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, and every other officer having government of people, were sworn on entering their office to use their best power and diligence to detect and prosecute all persons suspected of so heinous a crime.1

¹ Rot. Parl. IV. 24, 108, apud Lingard, Bymer, IX. 89 118, 129, 170, 193; Milman, Vol. V. p. 530-535.

Thus perished Wycliffe's labour,—not wholly, because his translation of the Bible still remained a rare treasure; a seed of future life, which would spring again under happier circumstances. But the sect which he organized, the special doctrines which he set himself to teach, after a brief blaze of success, which he set sank into darkness; and no trace remained the collars of Lollardry except the black memory of contempt and hatred with which the heretics of the four-teenth century were remembered by the English people, long after the actual Reformation had become the law of the land.

1 2 Hen. V. stat. 1, cap. 7.

I here is no better test of the popular opinion of a man than the character assigned to him on the stage, and till the close of the sixteenth can tary Sir John Oldcastle remained the profligate bufforn of English comedy Whether in life he bore the character so assigned to him, I am unable to say. The popularity of Henry V., and the splendour of his French wars neved no doubt to colour all who had opposed him with a biacker shade than they deserved: but it is almost certain that Shakapeare, though not mending Falstaff as a portrait of Oldcastle, thought of him as he was designing the character; and it is altogether certain that by the Loudon public Falstaff was supposed to represent Oldcastle. We can hardly suppose that such an expression as "my old lad of the castle." should be

So poor a close to a movement of so fair promise was due partly to the agitated temper of the Causes of Wycliffe's biliars, times; partly, perhaps, to a want of judgment in Wycliffe; but chiefly and essentially because it was an untimely birth. Wycliffe saw the evil; he did not watch to not see the remedy; and neither in his mind nor to be re-gretted, for the times in the mind of the world about him had the problem ripered itself for solution. STREET BASE would have gained little by the premature overthrow of the church, when the house out of which the evil spirit was east out could have been but swept and garnished for the occupation of the seven devils of anarchy.

The fire of heresy continued to smoulder, exploding occasionally in insurrection, occasionally blazing up in nobler form, when some poor seeker for the truth, groping for a vision of God in the darkness of the years which followed, found his way into that high presence through the martyr's fire. But substantially, the nation relapsed into obedience, — the church was reprieved for a century. Its fall was delayed till the spirit in which it was attacked was win-accidental, and in the epilogue to the Second Part of Heavy the Fourth, when promising to reintroduce Falstaff once more, Shakspeare says, " where for anything I know he shall die of the awent, for Oldcastle died a martyr, and thus is not the men." He had, therefore, certainly been supposed to be the mos, and Falstaff represented the English conception of the character of the Lollard hero. I should add, however, that Dean Milman, who has examined the records which remain to throw light on the character of this remarkable person with elaborate care and ability, concludes emphatically in his factour.

nowed clean of all doubtful elements - until Protes-

Two curious letters of Henry YI. upon the Lollards, written in 1481, tre printed in the Archeologia, Vol. XXIII. p. 339 &c. "As God know-th," he says of them, "never would they be subject to his laws nor to man's, but would be loose and free to rob, reve, and dispoil, slay and destroy all mon of thrift and worship, as they proposed to have done in our father's days; and of lade and lurdains would make lords."

not for a fairer adjustment of the world's good things, but in a desire for some deeper, truer, nobler, helier insight into the will of God. It recommenced not under the anspices of a Wycliffe, not with newbride the partial countenance of a government inc.

which was crossing swords with the Father of Catholic Christendom, and menacing the severance of England from the unity of the faith, but under a strong dynasty of undoubted Catholic loyalty, with the entire administrative power, secular as well as spiritual, in the hands of the episcopate. It sprung up spontaneously, unguided, unexcited, by the vital necessity of its nature, among the masses of the nation.

Leaping over a century, I pass to the year 1525, at which time, or about which time, a society amount was enrolled in London calling itself "The Brethrea enrolled in London of Christian Brothers." It was tenden composed of poor men, chiefly tradesmen, artisans, a few, a very few of the clergy; but it was carefully organized, it was provided with moderate funds, which were regularly audited; and its paid agents went up and down the country carrying Testaments and tracts with them, and enrolling in the order all persons who dand to risk their lives in such a cause. The system the beginning of the bishops' courts are filled from the beginning of the century with accounts of prosecutions for heresy—with prosecutions, that is, of men and women to whom the masses, the pilgrimages, the indulgences, the pardons, the effete paraphernalia of the establishment, had become intolerable; who had risen up in blind resistance, and had declared, with passionate anger, that whatever was the truth, all this was falsehood. The bishops had not been idle; they had plied their busy tasks with stake and preson, and victim after victim had been executed with more than necessary cruelty. But it was all in vain: punishment only multiplied offer tors, and "the reek" of the martyrs, as was said when Patrick Hamilton was burnt at St. Andrews, "infected all that it did blow upon."

² Preceedings of an organized Society in London called the Christian Brothren, supported by voluntary contributions, for the dispersion of tractal against the doctrines of the Church: Rolls House MS.

Hale's Procedesta. The London and Lincoln Registers, in Foxa, Vol. IV.; and the MS. Registers of Archbishops Morton and Warham, 4t Lambeth.

There were no teachers, however, there were no books, no unity of conviction, only a confused Absence of refusal to believe in lies. Copies of Wycliffe's guidance. Bible remained, which parties here and there, under death penalties if detected, met to read; 2 Difficulty copies, also, of some of his tracts were exfrom the went of books. tant; but they were unprinted transcripts, most rare and precious, which the watchfulness of the police made it impossible to multiply through the press, and which remained therefore necessarily in the possession of but a few fortunate persons.

The Protestants were thus isolated in single groups or families, without organization, without knowledge of each other, with nothing to give them coherency as a party; and so they might have long continued,

¹ Knox's History of the Reformation in Scotland.

^{*} Also we object to you that divers times, and specially in Robert Durdant's house, of Iver Court, near unto Staines, you erroneously and damnably read in a great book of heresy, all [one] night, certain chapters of the Evangelists, in English, containing in them divers erroneous and, lamnable opinious and conclusious of heresy, in the presence of divers suspected persons — Articles objected against Richard Butler — London Register: Foxe, Vol. IV. p. 178.

Foxe, Vol. IV. p. 176.

except for an impulse from some external circumstances. They were waiting for direction, and men in such a temper are seldom left to wait in vain.

The state of England did but represent the state of all Northern Europe. Wherever the Teu- Ground con tonic language was spoken, wherever the diston of the Teutonic nature was in the people, there was nations. the same weariness of unreality, the same craving for a higher life. England rather lagged behind than was a leader in the race of discontent. In Germany, all classes shared the common feeling; in England it was almost confined to the lowest. But, wherever it existed, it was a free, spontaneous growth in each separate breast, not propagated by agitation, but springing self-sown, the expression of the honest anger of honest men at a system which had passed the limits of teleration, and which could be endured no longer. At such times the minds of men are like a train of gunpowder, the isolated grains of which have no relation to each other, and no effect on each other, while they remain unignited; but let a spark kindle but one of them, and they shoot into instant union in a common explosion. Such a spark was kindled in Germany, at Wittenberg, on the 31st of October, church-door 1517. In the middle of that day Luther's been denunciation of Indulgences was fixed against the gate of All Saints church, Wittenberg, and it became, like the brazen serpent in the wilderness, the sign to which the sick spirits throughout the western world looked hopefully and were healed. In all those millions of hearts the words of Luther found an echo, And the kinding of and flew from lip to lip, from ear to ear. Europe. The thing which all were longing for was done, and in two years from that day there was scarcely perhaps a village from the Irish Channel to the Danube in which the name of Luther was not familiar as a word of hope and promise. Then rose a common cry for guidance. Books were called for, - above all things, the great book of all, the B.ble. Luther's inexhaustible fecundsty flowed with a steady stream, and the printingpresses in Germany and in the Free Towns of the Netherlands multiplied Testaments and tracts in hundreds of thousands. Printers published at their own expense as Luther wrote.1 The continent was covered with disfrocked monks who had become the pedlars of these precious wares; and as the contagion spread, noble young spirits from other countries, eager themselves to fight in God's battle, came to Wittenberg to learn from the champion who had struck the first blow at their great enemy how to use their weap-The gathering under the banner "Students from all nations came to Wittenberg," says one, " to hear Luther and As they came in sight of the town they Melanethon. returned thanks to God with clasped hands; for from Wittenberg, as heretofore from Jerusalem, proceeded the light of evangelical truth, to spread thence to the utmost parts of the earth." Thither came young Patrick Hamilton from Edinburgh, whose "reek" was of so much potency, a boy-enthusiast of nature as illustrious as his birth; and thither came also from England, which is here our chief concern, Tynchile first appear-William Tyndal, a man whose history is lost in his work, and whose epitaph is the Refor-Beginning life as a restless Oxford student, he moved thence to Cambridge, thence to Gloucestershire, to be tutor in a knight's family, and there hearing of Luther's doings, and expressing himself with too warm approval to suit his patron's conservation, he fell into disgrace. From Gloucestershipe he removed to London, where Cuthbert Tunstall had lavely been made bishop, and from whom he looked for countenance in an intention to translate the New Testament, Tunstall showed little encouragement to this enterprise; but a better friend rose where he was least looked for; and a London alderman, Humfrey Monmouth by name, hearing the young dreamer preach on some occasion at St. Dunstan's, took him to his home for half a year, and kept him there: where " the said Tyndal," as the alderman declared, "lived like a good priest, studying both night and day; he would eat but sodden meat, by his good will, nor drink but small single beer; nor was he ever seen to wear linen about him all the time of his being there." 2 The half year being passed, Monmouth gave him ten pounds, with which provision he went off to Wittenberg; and the alderman, for assisting h.m in that business, went to the Tower - escaping, however, we are glad to know, without worse consequences than a short imprisonment. Tyndal saw Luther, and under his immediate direction

Michelet, Life of Luther, p. 71. * Phid. * Phid. p. 41.

¹ Wood's Athena Oxomerses.

Foxe, Vol. IV. p. 618.

^{*} The suspicious eyes of the Bishops discovered Tyndal's visit, and the groult which was to be expected from it.

⁽⁾n Dec. 2d, 1525, Edward Lee, afterwards Archbishop of York, then king's almoner, and on a mission into Spain, wrote from Bordeaux to ware Henry. The letter is instructive:

[&]quot;Piesse your Highness to understand that I am certainly informed to I passed in this country, that an Englishman, your subject, at the solicitation and instance of Luther, with whom he is, both translated the New Testament into English; and within few days intendeth to return with the same imprinted into England. I need not to advertise your Grace what infection and danger may cosue hereby if it be not withstanded. This is the next way to fulfil your tester with Lutherians. For all Luther's pervense opinions be grounded upon bare words of Scripture, not well taken, no understanded which your Grace hath opened in sundry places of your royal translated the Gospels and Epistles while at Wittentranslated the Gospels and Epist

In Antwerp, under the care of these men, was asbelished the printing-press, by which books were supplied, to accomplish for the teaching of England what Luther and Melancthon were accomplishing for Germany. Tyndal's Testament was first printed, then translations of the best German books, reprints of Wycliffe's tracts or original commentaries. Such volumes as the people most required were here multiplied as fast as the press could produce them; and for the dissemination of these precious writings the brave London Protestants dared, at the hazard of their lives, to form themselves into an organized association.

It is well to pause and look for a moment at this me London small band of heroes; for heroes they were, if ever men deserved the name. Unlike the first reformers who had followed Wycliffe, they had no earthly object, emphatically none; and equally unlike beck. All our forefathers governous of the Church of England, hath with all diligence forbid and eschewed publication of England. Nowe, sire, as God hath endued your Grace with Christian contage to sett forth the standard against these Philistines and to vanquish them, so I doubt not but that he will sesset your Grace to prosecute and perform the same—that is, to undertread them that they shad not now lift up their heads; which they andeavour by means of English Bibles. They know what hurt such books nath done in your realm in times past."—Edward Lee to Henry VIII.: Ellis, thir? series, Vol. II. p. 71.

-]

them, perhaps, because they had no earthly object, they were a.l. as I have said, poor men -either students, like Tyndal, or artisans and labourers who worked for their own bread, and in tough contact with reality had learnt better than the great and the educated the difference between truth and lies. Wycliffe had royal dukes and noblemen for his supporters knights and divines among his disciples - a king and s House of Commons looking upon him, not without The first Protestants of the sixteenth century had for their king the champion of Holy Church, who had broken a lance with Luther; and spiritual rulers over them alike powerful and imbecile, whose highest conception of Christian virtue was the destruction of those who disobeyed their mandates. The masses of the people were indifferent to a cause which promised them no material advantage; and the Commons of Parliament, while contending with the abuses of the spiritual authorities, were laboriously anxious to wash their hands of heterodoxy. "In the crime of heresy, thanked be God," said the bishops in 1529, "there hath no notable person fallen in our time;" no chief priest, chief ruler, or learned Pharisee "Truth it is that certain apostate friers and monks, lewd priests, bankrupt merchants, vagabonds and lewd idle fellows of corrupt nature, have embraced the abominable and erroneous opinions lately sprung in Germany, and by them have been some seduced in simplicity and ignorance. Against these, if judgment have been exercised according to the laws of the realm, we be without If we have been too remiss or slack, we shall gladly do our duty from henceforth." 3 Such were the first Protestants in the eyes of their superiors.

1 Answer of the Bishops: Rolls House MS. See cap. 1.

one side was wealth, rank, dignity, the weight of authority, the majority of numbers, the prestige of The oppos-ing powers. centuries; here too were the phantom legions of superstition and cowardice; and here were all the worthier influences so preëminently English, which lead wise men to shrink from change, and to cling to things established, so long as one stone of them remains upon another. This was the army of conservatism. Opposed to it were a little band of enthusiasts, armed only with truth and fearlessness; "weak things of the world," about to do battle in God's name; and it was to be seen whether God or the world was the stronger They were armed, I say, with the truth. was that alone which could have given them victory in so unequal a struggle. They had returned to the essential fountain of life; they reasserted the principle which has lain at the root of all religions, whatever their name or outward form, which once burnt with divine lustre in that Catholicism which was now to pass away: the fundamental axiom of all real life, that the service which man owes to God is not the service of words or magic forms, or ceremonies or opinions; but the service of holiness, of purity, of obodience to the everlasting laws of duty.

When we look through the writings of Latimer, the apostle of the English Reformation, when we The early Protestanti read the depositions against the martyrs, and did not bring forward any the lists of their crimes against the established new teheme of destricts. faith, we find no opposite schemes of doctrine, no " plans of salvation;" no positive system of theology which it was held a duty to believe; these things were of later growth, when it became again necessary to clothe the living spirit in a perishable body, tested only We find only an effort to express again the against a old exhortation of the Wise Man—" Will have superstation, and you hear the beginning and the end of the hadden the principle whole matter? Fear God and keep his commandments; for that is the whole duty of man."

Had it been possible for mankind to sustain themselves upon this single principle without disguising its simplicity, their history would have been painted in far other colours than those which have so long chequered This, however, has not been given to us; and perhaps it never will be given. As the soul is clothed in flesh, and only thus is able to perform its functions in this earth, where it is sent to live; as the thought must find a word before it can pass from mind to mind; so every great truth seeks some body, some outward form in which to exhibit its powers. It appears in the world, and men lay hold of it, and represent it to themselves, in histories, in forms of words, in sacramental symbols; and these things which in their proper nature are but illustrations, stiffen into essential fact, and become part of the reality. So arises in era after era an outward and mortal expression of the inward immortal life; and at once the old struggle begins to repeat itself between the flesh and the spirit, the form and the reality. For a while the lower tendencies are held in check; the meaning of the symbolism is remembered and fresh; it is a living language, pregnant and suggestive. By and bye, as the mind passes into other phases, the meaning is forgotten; the language becomes a dead language; and the living robe of life becomes a winding-sheet of corruption. The form is represented as everything, the spirit as nothing; obedience is dispensed with; sin and religion arrange a compromise; and outward observances, or technical inward emotions, are converted into jugglers' tricks, by which men are enabled to enjoy their pleasures and escape the penalties of wrong. Then such religion becomes no religion, but a falsehood, and honourable men turn away from it, and fall back in haute upon the naked elemental life.

This, as I understand it, was the position of the early They found the service of God buried in a system where obedience was dissipated into superstition: where sin was explated by the vicarious virtues of other men; where, instead of leading a holy life, men were taught that their souls might be saved through masses said for them, at a money rate, by priests whose licentiousness disgraced the nation which endured it; a system in which, amidst all the trickery of the pardons, pilgrimages, indulgences, - doublefaced as these inventions are, wearing one meaning in the apologies of theologians, and quite another to the multitude who live and suffer under their in-The last form of the fluence, - one plain fact at least is visible. corruption of Catholi-The people substantially learnt that all evils which could touch either their spirits or their bodies might be escaped by means which resolved themselves, scarcely disguised, into the payment of moneys.

The Protestant term come when it was to pass away. Those in whom some craving lingered for a Christian life turned to the heart of the matter, to the book which told them who Christ was, and what he was; and finding there that holy example for which they longed, they flung aside in one noble burst of enthusiastic passion the disguise which had concealed it from them. They believed in Christ, not in the bowing rood, or the pretended wood of the cross on which he suffered; and when that saintly figure had once been seen, — the object of all love, the pattern of all imitation, — thenceforward neither form nor ceremony should stand between them and their God.

Under much confusion of words and thoughts, confusion pardonable in all men, and most of all in them, this seems to me to be transparently visible in the aim of these "Christian Brothers"; a thirst for some fresh and noble enunciation of the everlasting truth, the one essential thing for all men to know and believe. therefore they were strong; and therefore they at last conquered. Yet if we think of it, no comstand out at such a time in defence of such a counter. cause. The bishops might seize them on mere suspicion: and the evidence of the most abandoned villains sufficed for their conviction. By the act of Henry V., every officer, from the lord chancellor to the parish constable, was sworn to seek them out and destroy them; and both bishops and officials had shown no reluctance to execute their duty. Hunted like wild beasts from hiding-place to hiding-place, decimated by the stake, with the certainty that however many years they might be reprieved, their own lives would close at last in the same fiery trial; beset by informers, imprisoned, racked, and scourged; worst of all, haunted by their own infirmities, the flesh shrinking before the dread of a death of agony, - thus it was that they struggled on; earn ing for themselves martyrdom, - for us, the free England in which we live and breathe. Among the great, until Cromwell came to power, they had but Berry van one friend, and he but a doubtful one, who said very doubtful one who doub them. Henry VIII. was always attracted towards the persons of the reformers. Their open bearing commanded his respect. Their worst crime in the bishops' eyes — the translating the Bible — was in his eyes not a crime, but a merit; he had himself long desired an authorized English version, and at length compelled the clergy to undertake it; while in the most notorious of the men themselves, in Tyndal and in Frith, he had more than once expressed an anxious interest.1 But the convictions of his early years were long in yielding. His feeling, though genuine, extended no further than to pity, to a desire to recover estimable heretics out of errors which he would endeavour to pardon. They knew, and all the "brethren" knew, that if they persisted, they must look for the worst from the king and from every earthly power; they knew it, and they made their account with it. An informer deposed to the council, that he had asked one of the society "how the King's Grace did take the matter against the sacrament; which answered, the King's Highness was extreme against their opinions, and would punish them grievously; also that my Lords of Norfolk and Suffolk, my Lord Marquis of Exeter, with divers other great lords, were very extreme against them. Then he (the informer) asked him how he and his fellows would do seeing this, the which answered out against they had two thousand books out against the Blessed Sacrament, in the commons' hands; and if it were once in the commons' heads, they would have no further care." 1

1 Above: of the Bishops, Vol. I. cap. 4.

Tyndal then being at work at Antwerp, and the bestudes society for the dispersion of his books thus preparing itself in England, the authorities were not slow in taking the alarm. The isolated discontent which had prevailed hitherto had been left to the ordinary tribunals; the present danger called for measures of more systematic coercion. This duty naturally devolved on Wolsey, and the office of Grand Inquisitor, which he now assumed, could not have fallen into more competent hands.

² See, particularly, State Papers, Vol. VIL p. 109.

P Proceedings of the Christian Brothren: Rolls House MS.

Wolsey was not cruel. There is no instance, I believe, in which he of his special motion sent The conduct a victim to the stake; — it would be well if eutlon unthe same praise could be allowed to Cranmer. Welsey: There was this difference between the cardi-nal and other bishops, that while they seemed with unto desire to punish, Wolsey was contented forcy. to silence; while they, in their conduct of trials, made escape as difficult as possible, Wolsey sought rather to make submission easy. He was too wise to suppose that he could cauterize heresy, while the causes of it. in the corruption of the clergy, remained unremoved; and the remedy to which he trusted, was the infusing new vigour into the constitution of the church.1 Nevertheless, he was determined to repress, as far as outward measures could repress it, the spread of the contagion; and he set himself to accomplish his task with the full energy of his nature, backed by the whole power, spiritual and secular, of the kingdom. country was covered with his secret police, arresting suspected persons and searching for books. In London the scrutiny was so strict that at one time there was a general flight and panic; suspected butchers, tailors, and carpenters, hiding themselves in the holds of vessels in the river, and escaping across the Channel.¹ Even there they were not safe. Heretics were outlawed by a common consent of the European governments. Special offenders were hunted through France by the English emissaries with the permission and countenance of the court,² and there was an attempt to arrest Tyndal at Brussels, from which, for that time, he happily escaped.⁸

WOL. IL

Google

¹ See the letter of Bushop Fox to Wolsey: Strype's Memorials, Vol. 1 Appearing.

Simultaneously the English universities fell under examination, in consequence of the appearance of dangerous symptoms among the younger students. Dr. Barnes and Barnes, returning from the continent, had before well used violent language in a pulpit at Cambridge; and Latimer, then a neophyte in heresy, had grown suspect, and had alarmed the heads of houses. Complaints against both of them were forwarded to Wolsey, and they were summoned to London to answer for themselves.

Latiner, for some cause, found favour with the cardinal, and was dismissed, with a hope on the part of his judge that his accusers might prove as honest as he appeared to be, and even with a general licence to preach. Barnes was less fortunate; he was far inferior to Latimer; a noisy, unwise man, without reticence or prudence. In addition to his offences in matters of doctrine, he had attacked Wolsey himself with somewhat vulgar personality; and it

¹ Particulars of Persons who had dispersed Anabaptist and Latherns Tracts. Rolls House MS.

Dr. Taylor to Wolsey: Rolls House MS. Clark to W. lasy: State Papers, Vol. VII. pp. 80, 81.

Ellis, third series, Vol. II. p. 189.

Memoirs of Latimer prefixed to Sermons, pp. 3, 4 and see Strypt's Memorials, Yol. I.

was thought well to single him out for a public, though not a very terrible admonition. His house had been scarched for books, which he was suspected, and justly suspected, of having brought with him from abroad. These, however, through a timely warning of the danger, had been happily secreted, or it might have gone harder with him. As it was, he was compared to the Fleet on the charge of having community used heretical language. An abjuration was and bloom drawn up by Wolsey, which he signed; and while he remained in prison preparations were made for a ceremony, in which he was to bear a part, in St. Paul's church, by which the Catholic authorities hoped to produce some salutary effect on the disaffected spirits of London.

Vast quantities of Tyndal's publications had been collected by the police. The bishops, also, had subscribed among themselves to buy up the copies of the Fexa, Vol. V. p. 416.

Tunstall, Bushop of London, has had the credit hitherto of this lagentons folly, the effect of which, as Sir Thomas More warned him, could only be to supply Tyndal with money. — Hall, 162, 763. The following letter from the Bishop of Nerwich to Warham shows that Tunstall was only acting in canenical obedience to the resolution of his metropolitan: —

"In right humble manner I command me unto your good Lerichip, doing the same to understand that I lately received your letters, dated at your manor of Lambeth, the 25th day of the month of May, by the which I do perceive that your Grace hath lately gotten into your hands all the books of the New Testament, translated into English, and printed beyond the sen; as well those with the glosses joined unto them as those without the glosses.

"Surely, in myn opinion, you have done therein a gracious and a blessed teed; and God, I doubt not, shall highly reward you therefore. And when, in your said letters, ye write that, insomuch as this matter and the danger thereof, if runedy had not been provided, should not only have touched you, but all the bishops within your province; and that it is no reason that the holle charge and cost thereof should rest only in you; but that they and every of them, for their part, should advance and contribute certain same of money towards the same: I for my part will be contented to advance in this behalf, and to make payment thereof unto your servant, Manter William Potkyn.

New Testament before they left Antwerp;—an unreportion promising method, like an attempt to extinto a corresponding to the second guish fire by pouring oil upon it, they had been successful, however, in obtaining a large immediate harvest, and a pyramid of offending volumes was ready to be consumed in a solemn auto da fé.

In the morning of Shrove Sunday, then, 1527, we are to picture to ourselves a procession mov-Proceedon ing along London streets from the Fleet prison to St. Paul's Cathedral. The warden of the Fleet was there, and the knight marshal, and the tipstaffs, and "all the company they could make," " with bills and glaives; " and in the midst of these armed officials, six men marching in penitential dresses, one carrying a lighted taper five pounds' weight, the others with symbolic fagots, signifying to the lookers-on the fate which their crimes had earned for them, but which this time, in mercy, was remitted. One of these was Barnes; the other five were to St. Paul's. "Stillyard men," undistinguishable by any other name, but detected members of the brotherhood.

It was eight o'clock when they arrived at St. Paul's. The people had flocked in crowds before them. The public seats and benches were filled. All London had hurried to the spectacle. A platform was erected in [&]quot;Pleaseth it you to understand, I am well contented to give and advance in this behalf ten marks, and shall cause the same to be delivered shortly the which sum I think sufficient for my part, if every bishop within you province make like contribution, after the rate and substance of their beneficien. Nevertheless, if your Grace think this sum not sufficient for my nart in this matter, your further pleasure known, I shall be as glad to conform myself thereunto in this, or any other matter concerning the church, as any your subject within your province; as known Alanghty God, whe long preserve you. At Hexne in Suffolk, the 14th day of June, 1127 Tour humble obedience and bedeman, the centre of the nave, on the top of which, enthroned in pomp of purple and gold and splendour, sate the great cardinal, supported on each side with eighteen bishops, mitred abbots, and priors—six-and-thirty in all; his chaplains and "spiritual doctors" sitting also where they could find place, "in gowns of damask and satin. Opposite the platform, over the north door of the cathedral, was a great crucifix—a famous image, in those days called the Rood of Northen; and at the foot of it, inside a rail, a fire was burning, with the sinful books, the Tracts and Testaments, ranged round it in baskets, waiting for the execution of sentence.

R. Norwicks."

Such was the scene into the midst of which the six prisoners entered. A second platform stood And expension a conspicuous place in front of the cardi-protect. nal's throne, where they could be seen and heard by the crowd; and there upon their knees, with their fagots on their shoulders, they begged pardon of God and the Holy Catholic Church for their high crimes and offences. When the confession was finished, Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, preached a sermon; and the sermon over, Barnes turned to the people, declaring that "he was more charitably handled than he deserved, his heresies were so beinous and detestable."

There was no other religious service: mass had perhaps been said previous to the admission into the church of heretics lying under censure; and the knight marshal led the prisoners down from the stage to the fire underneath the crucifix. They were taken the rails, and three times led round and three within the rails, and three times led round in their the blazing pile, casting in their fagots as fixed. The libbs they passed. The contents of the baskets burning, were heaped upon the fagots, and the holocaust was complete This time, an unbloody sacrifice was deemed sufficient. The church was satisfied with penance, and Fisher pronounced the prisoners absolved, and received back into communion.¹

So ended this strange exhibition, designed to work great results on the consciences of the spectators. It may be supposed, however, that men whom the tragedies of Smithfield failed to terrify, were not likely to be affected deeply by melodrame and blazing paper.

A story follows of far deeper human interest, a story to in which the persecution is mirrored with its fathers, true lights and shadows, unexaggarated by rhetoric; and which, in its minute simplicity, brings us face to face with that old world, where men like ourselves lived, and worked, and suffered, three centuries ago.

Two years before the time at which we have now arrived, Wolsey, in pursuance of his scheme of converting the endowments of the religious houses to purposes of education, had obtained permission from the pope to suppress a number of the smaller monasteries. He had added largely to the means thus placed at his disposal from his own resources, and had founded the great college at Oxford, which is now called Carolinal's great college at Oxford, which is now called Christ church. Desiring his magnificent institution to be as perfect as art could make it, he had sought his professors in Rome, in the Italian universities, wherever genius or ability could be found; and he had introduced into the foundation several students fro a Cambridge, who had been reported to him as being of unusual promise. Frith, of whom who introwe have heard, was one of these. Of the rest, Oxford a hateber of John Clark, Sumner, and Taverner are the Cambridge most noticeable. At the time at which they unusal were invited to Oxford, they were tainted, lying under some of them were tainted in the auspicion of or some of them were tainted, in the eyes berey. of the Cambridge authorities, with suspicion of het erodoxy; and it is creditable to Wolsey's liberality, that he set aside these unsubstantiated rumours, not allowing them to weigh against ability, industry, and character. The church authorities thought only of crushing what opposed them, especially of crushing talent, because talent was dangerous. Wolsey's noble anxiety was to court talent, and if possible to win it.

¹ Foxe, Vol. IV.

² The papel bull, and the king's licence to proceed upon it are printed as Rymer, Vol. VI. Part II. pp. 3 and 17. The latter is explicit on Wolsey's personal liberality in establishing this foundation. Ultro et an proprié describée et munificantil, nec che gravissimo suo sumptu et impense est agium fundare constus.

The young Cambridge students, however, ill repaid his confidence (so, at least, it must have appeared to him), and introduced into Oxford the rising epidemic. Clark, as was at last discovered, was in the habit of reading St. Protestant distinity class in formed at wolvey's and a gradually increasing circle of undergraduates, of three or four years' standing, from various colleges, formed themselves into a spiritual freemasoury, some of them passionately insisting on being admitted to the lectures, in spite of warnings from Clark himself, whose wiser foresight knew the risk which they were running,

I Would God my Lord his Grace had never been motioned to call any Cambridge man to his most towardly college. It were a gracious deed if they were trief and purged and restored unto their mother from wheater they came, if they be worthy to come thither again. We were clear without blot or suspicion till they came, and some of them, as Master Dean anth known a long time, bath had a shrewd name. —Dr. London to A 'eb slebop Warham: Rolls House MS.

¹ Dr. London to Warkam: Rolls House MS.

and shrank from allowing weak giddy spirits to thrust themselves into so fearful peril.¹

This little party had been in the habit of meeting for about six months,2 when at Easter, 1527, Garres, feliow of Thomas Garret, a fellow of Magdalen,* who Magdalen, and member had gone out of residence, and was curate at of the Lon ion Society, All Hallows church, in London, reappeared Garret was a secret member of the Lonin Oxford. don Society, and had come down at Clark's instigation to feel his way in the university. So excellent a beginning had already been made, that he had only to improve upon it. He sought out all such young men as were given to Greek, Hebrew, and the polite Latin; 5 and in this visit met with so much encouragement, that the Christmas following he returned again, this time bringing with him treasures of forbidden Introduces books, imported by "the Christian Brothinto Oxford the forbid. den books ers"; New Testaments, tracts and volumes from therof German divinity, which he sold privately among the initiated.

He lay concealed, with his store, at "the house of one Radley," the position of which cannot now be identified; and there he remained for several weeks, unsuspected by the university authorities, till orders were sent by Wolsey to the Dean of Christchurch for his arrest. Precise information was furnished at the same time respecting him-

- j

Delaber's Narrative.

^{*} Clark seems to have taken pupils in the long vacation. Dalabes at least read with him all one summer in the country. -- Dr. London to Warham: Rolle House MS.

^{*} The Vicar of Bristol to the Master of Lincoln College, Oxford: Rolle House MS.

Dr. London to Warham: Rolle House MS.

F Radley himself was one of the singers at Christchurch, London to Warham. MS.

self, his mission in Oxford, and his place of concealment.¹

The proctors were put upon the scent, and directed to take him; but one of them, Arthur Cole, of Magdalen, by name, not from any sympathy with Garret's objects, as the sequel by a proctor proved, but probably from old acquaintance, to see performation of his danger, and warned him to escape.

His young friends, more alarmed for their companion than for themselves, held a meeting instantly to decide what should be done; and at this meeting was Anthony Dalaber, an undergraduate of Alban Hall, and one of Clark's pupils, who will now tell the story of what followed.

" The Christmas before that time, I, Anthony Dalaber, the scholar of Alban Hall, who had Balaberts books of Master Garret, had been in my marrative. country, at Dorsetshire, at Stalbridge, where I had a brother, parson of this parish, who was very desirous to have a curate out of Oxford, and willed me in any wise to get him one there, if I could. This just occasion offered, it was thought good among the brethren (for so we did not only call one another, but were indeed one to another), that Master Garret, changing his name, should be sent forth with my letters into Dorsetshire, to my brother, to serve him there for a ame, until he might secretly convey himself from thence some whither over the sea. According hereunto I wrote my letters in all haste possible unto my brother, for Master Garret to be his curate; but not declaring what he was indeed, for my brother was a rank papist, and afterwards was the most mortal enemy that ever I had, for the Gospel's sake.

1 Dr. London to Warham: Rolls House M8

"So on Wednesday (Feb. 18), in the morning before Shrove-tide, Master Garrot departed out of Oxford towards Dorsetshire, with my letter, for his new service."

The most important person being thus, as was supposed, safe from immediate danger, Dalaber Anthray Dalaber, of Alban Hall, was at leisure to think a little about himself: and her been and supposing, naturally, that the matter you proced by the escape, would not end there, and that some change man to of residence might be of advantage for his Atold Assapielem. own security, he moved off from Alban Hall (as undergraduates it seems were then at liberty to do) to Gloncester College,1 under pretence And moved to Giovoester that he desired to study civil law, for which College. no facilities existed at the hall. This little matter was effected on the Thursday; and all Friday and Saturday morning he " was so much busied in setting his poor stuff in order, his bed, his books, and such things else as he had," that he had no leisure to go forth anywhere those two days, Friday and Saturday.

"Having set up my things handsomely," he continues, "that same day, before noon, I determined to spend that whole afternoon, until evensong time, at Frideswide College," at my book in mine own study; and so shut my chamber door unto me, and my study door also, and took into my head to read Francis Lambert upon the Gospel of St. Luke, which book on'y I had then within there. All my other books written on the Scriptures, of which I had great numbers, I had left in my chamber at Alban's Hall, where I had made

² On the site of the present Worcester College. It lay beyond the walls of the tewn, and was then some distance from it across the field.

Christchurch, where Dalaber occasionalty sung in the quire. Vide wery secret place to keep them safe in, because it was to dangerous to have any such books. And so, as I was diligently reading in the same book of Lambert upon Luke, suddenly one knocked at my chamber door very hard, which made me astonished, and yet I sat still and would not speak; then he knocked again more hard, and yet I held my peace; and straightway he knocked again yet more fiercely; and then I thought this: peradventure it is somebody that hath need of me; and therefore I thought myself bound to do as I would be done unto; and so, laying my book aside, I came to the door and opened it, and there Garret rewas Master Garret, as a man amazed, whom the field priced, Priday, I thought to have been with my brother, and Feb. 20.

Garret had set out on his expedition into Dorsetshire, but had been frightened, and had stolen back into Oxford on the Friday, to his old hiding-place, where, in the middle of the night, the proctors had taken him. He had been carried to Lincoln, and shut up He is taken in a room in the rector's house, where he at Lincoln. had been left all day. In the afternoon the rector went to chapel, no one was stirring about the college, and he had taken advantage of the opportunity to slip the bolt of the door and escape. He had a From whence he friend at Gloucester College, "a monk who escapea, Baturlay, bad bought books of him; " and Glouces- Feb. 21, ter lying on the outskirts of the town, he had hurried down there as the readiest place of shelter. The monk was out; and as no time was to be lost, Garret asked the servant on the staircase to show him Dalaber's rooms.

As soon as the door was opened, "he said he was undone, for he was taken." "Thus he spake unadvisedly in the presence of the young man, who at once slipped down the stairs," it was to be feared, on no good errand. "Then I said to him," Dalaber goes on, "alas, Master Garret, by this your uncircumspect coming here and speaking so before the young man, you have disclosed yourself and utterly undone me. I asked him why he was not in Dorsetshire. He said he had gone a day's journey and a half; but he was so fearful, his heart would none other but that he must needs return again unto Oxford. With deep sighs and plenty of tears, he prayed me to help to convey him away; and so he cast off his hood and gown wherein he came to me, and desired me to give him a coat with sleeves, if I had any; and he told me that he would go into Wales, and thence convey himself, if he might, into Germany. Then I put on him a sleeved coat of mine. He would also have had another manner of cap of me, but I had none but priestlike, such as his own was.

"Then kneeled we both down together upon our knees, and lifting up our hearts and hands to God our heavenly Father, desired him, with plenty of tears, so to conduct and prosper him in his journey, that he might well escape the danger of all his enemies, to the glory of His Holy Name, if His good pleasure and will so were. And then we embraced and kissed the one the other, the tears so abundantly flowing out from both our eyes, that we all bewet both our leads him.

faces, and scarcely for sorrow could we speak
the faces, and scarcely for sorrow could we speak
the faces, and scarcely for sorrow could we speak
one to another. And so he departed from me, apparelled in my coat, being committed unto the trition of our Almighty and merciful Father.

"When he was gone down the stairs from my chamber, I straightways did shut my chamber door, and went into my study; and taking the New Testament in my hands, kneeled down on my knees, and with many a deep sigh and salt tear, I did, with much deliberation, read over the tenth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, praying that God would endue his tender and lately-born little flock in Oxford with heavenly strength by his Holy Spirit; that quietly to their own salvation, with all godly patience, they might bear Christ's heavy cross, which I now saw was presently to be laid on their young and weak backs, unable to bear so huge a burden without the great help of his Holy Spirit.

"This done, I laid aside my book safe, folded up Master Garret's gown and hood, and so, have not be reduced ing put on my short gown, and shut my with doors, I went towards Frideswide (Christchurch), to speak with that worthy martyr of God, Master Clark.

¹ Some part of which let us read with him. "I send you forth as sheep in the midst of welves; be ye therefore wise as serpents and barraless as doves. But beware of men, for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues; and ye shall be brought before governors and kings for my take, for a testimony against them and the gentiles. But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak, for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak; for it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you. And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child; and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake but he that endureth to the and shall be raved. Whospever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. Whoseever shall deny me before men, him will I also deay before my Father which is in heaven. Think not that I am some to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I all come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. and a man's fees shall be they of his own household. He that leveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. He that leveth son ar daughter more than me is not worthy of me. He that taketh not his great and felloweth after me is not worthy of the. He that findeth his life shall less it, and he that lessth his life for my sake shall find it."

But of purpose I went by St. Mary's church, to go first unto Corpus Christi College, to speak with Diet and Udal, my faithful brethren and fellows in the Lord. By chance I met by the way a brother of ours, one Master Eden, fellow of Magdalen, who, as soon as he saw me, said, we were all undone, for Master Garret was returned, and was in prison. I said it was not so; he said it was. I heard, quoth he, our Proctor, Master Cole, say and dec are the same this day. Then I told him what was done; and so made haste to Frideswide, to find Master Clark, for I thought that he and others would be in great sorrow.

"Evensong was begun; the dean and the canons were there in their grey amices; they were almost at Magnificat before I came thither. I stood in the choir door and heard Master Taverner play, and others of the chapel there sing, with and among whom I myself was wont to sing also; but now my singing and music were turned into sighing and musing. As I there stood, in cometh Dr. Cottisford,1 the commissary, as fast as ever he could go, bareheaded, as pale as ashes (I knew his grief well enough); and to the dean he goeth into the choir, where he was sitting in his stall, and talked with him, very sorrowfully: what, I know not; but whereof I might and did truly I went aside from the choir door to see and hear more. The commissary and dean came out of the choir, wonderfully troubled as it seemed. About the middle of the church, met them Dr. London, puffing, blustering, and blowing like a hungry and greecy tion seeking his prey. They talked together awhile, but the commissary was much blamed by them, insomuch that he wept for sorrow.

³ Rector of Lincoln.

Warden of New College.

"The doctors departed, and sent abroad their servants and spies everywhere. Master Clark, about the middle of the compline, came forth of the choir. I followed him to his chamber, and declared what had happened that afternoon of Master Garret's escure. Then he sent for one Master Sumner and The beetless Master Bets, fellows and canons there. In mook. the meantime he gave me a very godly exhortation, praying God to give us all the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of doves, for we should shortly have much need thereof. When Master Sumner and Master Bets came, he caused me to declare again the whole matter to them two. Then desiring them to tell our other brethren in that college, I went to Corpus Christi College, to comfort our brethren there, where I found in Diet's chamber, looking for me, Fitzjames, Diet, and Udal. They all knew the matter before by Master Eden, whom I had sent unto Fitzjames. So I tarried there and supped with them, where they had provided meat and drink for us before my coming; and when we had ended, Fitzjames would needs have me to lie that night with him in my old lodging at Alban's Hall. But small rest and little sleep took we both there that night."

The next day, which was Sunday, Dalaber rose at five o'clock, and as soon as he could leave sunday, the Hall, hastened off to his rooms at Gloucester. The night had been wet and stormy, and his shoes and stockings were covered with mud. The college gates, when he reached them, were still closed, an unusual thing at that hour; and he walked up and down under the walls in the bleak grey morning, till the clock struck seven, "much disquieted, his head full of forecasting cares," but resolved, like a brave man, that come what would, he would accuse no one, and declare nothing but what he saw was already known. The gates were at last opened; he went to his rooms, and for some time his key would not turn in the door, the lock having been meddled Databer's COOTES. At length he succeeded in entering. with. searched by the commit and found everything in confusion, his bed tossed and tumbled, his study-door open, and his clothes strewed about the floor. A monk who occupied the opposite rooms, bearing him return, came to him and said that the commissary and the two proctors had been there looking for Garret. Bills and swords had been thrust through the bed-straw, and every corner of the room searched for him. Finding nothing, they had left orders that Dalaber, as soon as he returned, should appear before the prior of the students.

¹ The last prayer.

"This so troubled me," Dalaber says, "that I forgot to make clean my hose and shoes, and to shift me into another gown; and all bedirted as I was, I went to the said prior's chamber." The prior asked him where he had slept that night. At Alban's Hall, he answered, with his old bedfellow, Fitzjames. prior said he did not believe him, and asked if Garret had been at his rooms the day before. He replied that he had. Whither had he gone, then? the prior inquired; and where was he at that time? swered," says Dalaber, "that I knew not. unless he was gone to Woodstock; he told me Is is examthat he would go there, because one of the zh (Megd'a keepers had promised him a piece of venison to make merry with at Shrovetide. This tale I thought meetest, though it were nothing so.")

² Dr. Maltland, who has an indifferent opinion of the early Protestanta

mát. j

At this moment the university beadle entered with two of the commissary's servants, bringing a He to taken to Macton message to the prior that he should repair at cheer and once to Lincoln, taking Dalaber with him. by the com-"I was brought into the chapel," the latter is other continues, "and there I found Dr. Cottisford, bouses. rommissary; Dr. Higdon, Dean of Cardinal's College; and Dr. London, Warden of New College; standing together at the altar. They called for chairs and sate down, and then [ordered] me to come to them; they asked me what my name was, how long I had been at the university, what I studied," with various other inquiries: the clerk of the university, meanwhile, bringing pens, ink, and paper, and arranging a table with a few loose boards upon tressels. A mass book, he says, was then placed before him, and he was commanded to lay his hand upon it, and swear that he would answer truly such questions as should be asked him. At first he refused; but afterwards, being especially on the point of varacity, brings forward this assertion of Dalaber as an illustration of what he considers their recklessness. It seems obwious, however, that a falsehood of this kind is semething different in kind from what we commonly mean by unverseity, and has no affinity with it. I do not see my way to a conclusion; but I am satisfied that Dr. Maitland's strictures are unjust. If Garret was taken, he was in danger of a cruel death, and his escape could only be made possible by throwing the bloodhounds off the scent. A refusal to answer would not have been sufficrient; and the general laws by which our conduct is ordinarily to be directed cannot be made so universal in their application as to meet all contingencies. It is a law that we may not strike or kill other men, but occasions rise in which we may impocently do both. I may kill a man in defence of my own life or my friend a life, or even of my friend a property; and surely the circumstances which dispense with obedience to one law may dispense equally with obedience to another. If I may kill a man to prevent him from robbing my friend, why may I not deceive a man to save my friend from being barbarously mordered? It is possible that the highest morality would forbid me to do either. I am anable to see why If the first be permanable, the second should be a crime. Kahab of Janiche did the same thing which Dalaber did, and on that very ground was placed in the entelogue of saints.

persuaded, "partly by fair words, and partly by great threats," he promised to do as they would have him; but in his heart he "meant nothing so to do." "So I laid my hand on the book," he goes on, "and one of them gave me my oath, and commanded me to kiss the book. They made great courtesy between them who should examine me; at last, the rankest Pharisee of them all took upon him to do it.

"Then he asked me again, by my oath, where Master Garret was, and whither I had conveyed Ho again him. I said I had not conveyed him, nor yet wist where he was, nor whither he was gone, except he were gone to Woodstock, as I had before said. Surely, they said, I brought him some whither this morning, for they might well perceive by my foul shoes and dirty hosen that I had travelled with him the most part of the night. I answered plainly, that I lay at Alban's Hall with Sir Fitzjames, and that I had good witness thereof. They asked me where I was at evensong. I told them at Frideswide, and that I saw, first, Master Commissary, and then Master Doctor London, come thither to Master Dean. Doctor London and the Dean threatened me that if I would not tell the truth I should surely be sent to the Tower of London, and there be racked, and put into Little-ease.1

"At last when they could get nothing out of me whereby to hurt or accuse any man, or to know anything of that which they sought, they all three together brought me up a long stairs, into a great chamber, over Master Commissary's chamber, wherein stood a great pair of very high stocks. Then Master Commissary asked me for my purse and girdle, and took away my money and my knives; and then they put my legs into the stocks, and so locked me fast And h put in them, in which I sate, my feet being alin the high as my head; and so they departed, locking fact the deep and location are alone.

A cell in the Tower, the nature of which we need not inquire into.

ing fast the door, and leaving me alone.

"When they were all gone, then came into my remembrance the worthy forewarning and godly declaration of that most constant martyr of God, Master John Clark, who, well nigh two years before that, when I did earnestly desire him to grant me to be his scholar, said unto me after this sort: 'Dalaber, you desire you wot not what, and that which you are, I lear, unable to take upon you; for though now my preaching be sweet and pleasant to you, because there is no perseention laid on you for it, yet the time will come, and that, peradventure, shortly, if ye continue to live godly therein, that God will lay on you the cross of persecution, to try you whether you can as pure gold abide the fire. You shall be called and judged a heretic; you shall be abhorred of the world; your own friends and kinsfolk will forsake you, and also hate you; you shall be cast into prison, and none shall dare to help you; you shall be accused before bishops, to your reproach and shame, to the great sorrow of all your friends and kinsfolk. Then will ye wish ye had never known this doctrine; then will ye curse Clark, and wish that ye had never known him because he hath brought you to all these troubles.'

"At which words I was so grieved that I fell down on my knees at his feet, and with tears and sighs besought him that, for the tender mercy of God, he would not refuse me; saying that I trusted, verily, that he which had begun this in me would not forsake me, but would give me grace to continue therein to the end. When he heard me say so, he came to me, took me in his arms and kissed me, the tears trickling from his eyes; and said unto me: 'The Lord God Almighty grant you so to do; and from henceforth for ever, take me for your father, and I will take you for my son in Christ.'"

In these meditations the long Sunday morning wore away. A little before noon the commissary fines to concame again to see if his prisoner was more amenable; finding him, however, still obstinate, he offered him some dinner - a promise which we will hope he fulfilled, for here Dalaber's own narrative abruptly forsakes us,1 leaving uncompleted, at this point, the most vivid picture which remains to us of a fraction of English life in the reign of Henry VIII. If the curtain fell finally on the little group of students, this narrative alone would furnish us with rare insight into the circumstances under which the Protestants fought their way. The story, however, can be carried something further, and the strangest incident connected with it remains to be told.

Dalaber breaks off on Sunday at noon. The same day, or early the following morning, he was submitted once more to examination: this time, for the discovery of his own offences, and to induce him to give up his confederates. With respect to the latter he proved "marvellous obstinate." "All that was gotten of him was with much difficulty," nor would he confess to any names as connected with heresy or heretics except that of Clark, which was already known. About himself he was more the own open. He wrote his "book of heresy," that is, his confession of faith, "with his own hand," - his evening's occupation, perhaps, in the stocks in the rector of Lincoln's house; and the next day he was transferred to prison.1

1 Poze, Vol. Y. p. 491

This offender being thus disposed of, and strict secresy being observed to prevent the spread of alarm. a rapid search was set on foot for books in sourch as all suspected quarters. The fear of the au- looks. thorities was that "the infect persons would flee," and "convey" their poison "away with them." The officials, once on the scent of heresy, were skilful in running down the game. No time was lost, and by Monday evening many of "the brethren" had been arrested, their rooms examined, and their forbidden tressures discovered and rifled. Dalaber's store was found "hid with marvellous secresy;" and in one student's desk a duplicate of Garret's list - the titles of the volumes with which the first "Religious Tract Society " set themselves to convert England.

Information of all this was conveyed in haste by Dr. London to the Bishop of Lincoln, as the ordinary of the university; and the warden told his story with much self-congratulation. On one point, however, the news which he had to communicate was less satisfactory. Garret himself was gone - utterly gone. Dalaber was obstinate, and no clue to the track of the fugitive could be discovered. The police were at fault; neither bribes nor threats could elicit any- The bonds of thing; and in these desperate circumstances, bottom con-take told the bishop, the three heads of houses bottom y to conceived that they might strain a point of the cover the propriety for so good a purpose as to prevent desert

the escape of a heretic. Accordingly, after a full re-

2 Trid.

¹ Dr. Landon to the Bishop of Lincoln: Rolls House MS.

port of the points of their success, Doctor London west on to relate the following remarkable proceeding:

 After Master Garret escaped, the commissary being in extreme pensiveness, knew no other remedy but this extraordinary, and eaused a figure to be made by one expert in astronomy - and his judgment doth continually persist upon this, that he fled in a tawny cost with-eastward, and is in the middle of London, and will shortly to the sea side. He was curate unto the parson of Honey Lane. It is likely he is privily Wherefore, as soon as I knew the cloaked there. judgment of this astronomer. I thought it expedient and my daty with all speed to ascertain your good lordship of all the premises; that in time your lordthip may advertise my lord his Grace, and my lord of London. It will be a gracious deed that he and all his pestiferous works, which he carrieth about, might be taken, to the salvation of his soul, opening of many privy heresies, and extinction of the same." a

We might much desire to know what the bishop's sensations were in reading this letter—to know whether it occurred to him that in this naïve acknowledgment, the Oxford heresy hunters were themselves confessing to an act of heresy; and that by the law of the church, which they were so eager to administer, they were liable to the same death which they were so zealous to secure for the poor vendors of Testaments. So indeed they really were. Consulting the stars had been ruled from immemorial time to be dealing with the devil; the penalty of it was the same as for witchcraft; yet here was a reverend warden of a college considering it his duty to write eagerly of a discovery obtained by these forbidden means, to his own diocesan, begging him to communicate with the Cardinal of York and the Bishop of London, that three of the highest church authorities in England might become participes criminis, by acting on this disbolical information.

¹ Dr. Forman, rector of All Hallows, who had himself been in trouble for heterodoxy.

Dr. London to the Bishop of Lincoln, Pols. 20, 1828; Rolls House Mil.

Meanwhile, the commissary, not wholly relying on the astrologer, but resolving prudently to the principal make use of the more earthly resources for Garrer's which were at his disposal, had sent information of Garrer's escape to the corporations of Dover, Rye, Winchester, Southampton, and Bristol, with descriptions of the person of the fugitive; and this step was taken with so much expedition, that before the end of the week no vessel was allowed to leave either of those harbours without being strictly searched.

The natural method proved more effectual than the supernatural, though again with the assistance of a singular accident. Garret had not gone to London; unfortunately for himself, he had not gone to Wales as he had intended. He left Oxford, as we saw, the evening of Saturday, February 21st. That night he reached a village called Corkthrop, where he lay concealed till Wednesday; and then, not in the astrologer's orange-tawny dress, but in "a courtier's coat and buttoned cap," which he had by some means contrived to procure, he set out again on his forlorn journey, darret gone making for the nearest sea-port, Bristol, and is mind a white where the police were looking out to receive hither-inhim. His choice of Bristol was peculiarly of the output unlucky. The "chapman" of the town was the step-father of Cole, the Oxford proctor: to this person, whose name was Master Wilkyns, the proctor had written a special letter, in addition to the commissary's circular; and the family connexion acting as a spur to his natural activity, a coast-guard had been set before Garret's arrival, to watch for him down the Avon banks, and along the Channel shore for fifteen miles. All the Friday night "the mayor, with the aldermen, and twenty of the council, had kept privy watch," and searched suspicious houses at Master Wilkyns's instance; the whole population were on the alert, and when the next afternoon, a week after his escape, the poor heretic, footsore and weary, dragged himself into the town, he found that he had walked into the lion's mouth.1 He quickly learnt the danger to which he was exposed, and hurried off again with the best speed which he could command: but it was too The chapman, alert and indefatigable, had heard that a stranger had been seen in the street; the police were set upon his track, and he was taken at Bedminster, a suburb on the opposite bank of the Avon, and hurried before a magistrate, where he at once acknowledged his identity.

⁴ Now Cokethorpe Park, three miles from Stanton Harcourt, and about twelve from Oxford. The village has disappeared.

With such happy success were the good chapman's efforts rewarded. Yet in this world there is Saturday. Fab. 25. no light without shadow; no pleasure without its alloy. In imagination, Master Wilkyns had thought of himself conducting the prisoner in Marter WDkyos's tritriumph into the streets of Oxford, the hero umpt, hopes, and The sour formality of the law of the hour. dies ppointcondemned him to ill-merited disappointment. Garret had been taken beyond the liberties of the city, it was necessary, therefore, to commit him to the county gaol, and he was sent to Ilchester. "Master Wakyns offered himself to be bound to the said justice in three hundred pounds to discharge him there is the said Garret, and to see him surely to the said Garret, and to see him surely to the said of the said Garret, and to see him surely to the said of the said Garret, and the order of the law would not so serve." The fortunate capter had therefore to content himself with the consciousness of his exploit, and the favourable report of his conduct which was sent to the bishops; and Garret went first to Ilchester, and thence was taken by special writ, and surrendered to Wolsey.

1 Vicas of AR Saints, Bristol, to the Rector of Lincoln: Rolls House MS

Thus unkind had fortune shown herself to the chief criminal, guilty of the unpardonable offence of selling Testaments at Oxford, and therefore hunted down as a mad dog, and a common enemy of mankind. He escaped for the present the heaviest consequences, for Wolsey persuaded him to abjure.

A few years later we shall again meet him, when he had recovered his better nature, and would not abjure, and died as a brave man should die. In the mean time we return to the university, where the authorities were busy trampling out the remains of the conflagration.

Two days after his letter respecting the astrologer, the Warden of New College wrote again to the layerstathe Diocesan, with an account of his further of the proceedings. He was an efficient inquisitor, and the secrets of the poor undergraduates had been unravelled to the last thread. Some of "the brethren" had confessed; all were in prison; and the doctor desired instructions as to what should be done with them. It must be said for Dr. London, that he was anxious that they should be treated leniently. Dalaber described him as a roaring lion, and he was a bad man, and came at last to a bad end. But it is pleasant to find that even he, a mere blustering arrogant official, was not wholly without redeeming points of character, and as little good will be said for him hereafter, the following passage in his second letter may be placed to the credit side of his account. The tone in which he wrote was at least humane, and must pass for more than an expression of natural kindness, when it is remembered that he was addressing a person with whom tendemess for heresy was a crime.

² The Vicar of Ale Saints to the Rector of Lincoln: Rolls Hous MS.

"These youths," he said, " have not been long con-Dector Less versant with Master Garret, nor have greatly the Blobbon of Lincoln, fore Master Garret was taken, divers of them advising a were weary of these works, and delivered them to Dalaber. I am marvellous sorry for the young If they be openly called upon, although they appear not greatly infect, yet they shall never avoid slander, because my Lord's Grace did send for Master Garret to be taken. I suppose his Grace will know of your good lordship everything. Nothing shall be hid, I assure your good lordship, an every one of them were my brother; and I do only make this mean for these youths, for surely they be of the most towardly young men in Oxford; and as far as I do yet perceive, not greatly infect, but much to blame for reading any part of these works."1

Doctor London's intercession, if timid, was generous; he obviously wished to suggest that the matter should be hushed up, and that the offending parties should be dismissed with a reprimend. If the decision had rested with Wolsey, it is likely that this view would have been readily acted upon. But the Bishop of Lincoln was a person in whom the spirit of humanity had been long exorcised by the spirit of an ecclesiastic. He was staggering along the last years of a life against which his own register bears dreadful witness, and he would not burden his conscience with mercy to heretics. He would not mur the the bishop completeness of his barbarous career. He punishwout singled out three of the prisoners — Garret, Clark, and Ferrars 2— and especially entreated that they should be punished. "They be three perilous men," he wrote to Wolsey, "and have been the occasion of the corruption of youth. They have done much mischief, and for the love of God let them be handled thereafter." 8

³ Dr. London to the Bishop of Lincoln: Rolls House MS.

Wolsey had Garret in his own keeping, and declined to surrender him. Ferrars had been taken at the Black Friars, in London, and making his submission, was respited, and escaped with abjuration. But Clark was at Oxford, in the bishop's power, and the wicked old man was allowed to work his will upon him. A bill of heresy was drawn, which the prisoner was required to sign. He refused, and must have been clark the sent to the stake, had he not escaped by dynison. It is last words only are recorded.

¹ Long extracts from it are printed in Foxe, Vol. IV.

Another of the brethren, afterwards Bishop of St. David's, and can of the Marian victims.

Bushop of Lincoln to Wolsey, March 5, 1827-8: Rolls Rouse MS.; and see Ellis, thard series, Vol. II. p. 77.

Ellis, third series, Vol. II. p. 77.

⁶ With some others he " was cast into a prison where the salt-fish lay, through the stink whereof the most part of them were infected; and the said Clark, being a tender young man, died in the same prison." — Form Vel. IV. p. 615.

He was refused the communion, not perhaps as a special act of cruelty, but because the laws of the church would not allow the holy thing to be profaned by the touch of a heretic. When he was told that it would not be suffered, he said "creds et manducdsti"—"faith is the communion;" and so passed away; a very noble person, so far as the surviving features of his character will let us judge; one who, if his manhood had fulfilled the promise of his youth, would have taken no common part in the Reformation.

The remaining brethren were then dispersed. Some malar and were sent home to their friends, -- others, wry how Anthony Dalaber among them, were placed on their trial, and being terrified at their position, recanted, and were sentenced to do penance. Ferrars was brought to Oxford for the occasion, and we discern indistinctly (for the mere fact is 6.1 which survives) a great fire at Carfax; a crowd of spectators, and a procession of students marching up High-street with fagots on their shoulders, the solemn beadles leading them with gowns and maces. The ceremony was repeated to which Dr. Barnes had been submitted They were taken three times round the at St. Paul's. fire, throwing in each first their fagot, and then some one of the offending books, in token that they repented and renounced their errors.

Thus was Oxford purged of heresy. The state of innocence which Dr London pathetically lamented was restored, and the heads of houses had peace till their rest was broken by a ruder storm.

In this single specimen we may see a complete image of Wolsey's persecution, as with varying details it was carried out in every town and village from the Tweed to the Land's End. I dwell on the stories of individual suffering, not to colour the narrative, or to reawaken feelings of bitterness which may well rest now and sleep for ever, but because, through the years in which it was struggling for recognition, the history of Protestantism is the history of its martyrs. The early history of No rival theology, as I have said, had as yet Protestant shaped itself into formulas. We have not to bloory of the trace any slow growing elaboration of opin- worksoon, Protestantism, before it became an establish ment, was a refusal to live any longer in a lie. It was a falling back upon the undefined untheoretic rules of truth and piety which lay upon the surface of the Bible, and a determination rather to die than to mock with unreality any longer the Almighty Maker of the world. We do not look in the dawning manifestations of such a spirit for subtleties of intellect. Intellect, as it ever does, followed in the wake of the higher virtues of manly honesty and truthfulness. And the And its orievidences which were to effect the world's mountain conversion were no cunningly arranged syllogistic demonstrations, but once more those loftier evidences which lay in the calm endurance by heroic men of the extremities of suffering, and which touched, not the mind with conviction, but the heart with admiring reverence.

1 London to Warham: Rolls Rosse MS.

In the concluding years of his administration, Wolsey was embarrassed with the divorce. Difficulties were gathering round him, from the failure of his hopes abroad and the wreck of his popularity at home; and the activity of the persecution was something relaxed, at the guiding mind of the great minister ceased to have leisure to attend to it. The bishops, however, continued, each in his own diocese, to act with such vigour as they possessed. Their courts were Wokey fills, DUT IN DOCunceasingly occupied with vexatious suits, men don i eon tin pad commenced without reason, and conducted by the without justice. They summoned arbitrarily as suspected offenders whoever had the misfortune to have provoked their dislike: either compelling them to criminate themselves by questions on the intricacies of theology,1 or allowing sentence to be passed against them on the evidence of abandoned persons, who would not have been admissible as witnesses before the secular tribunals.3

It might have been thought that the clear perception which was shown by the House of Com-The House of Commons. mons of the injustice with which the trials for in checking CALUTE AND herery were conducted, the disregard, shamepromoutions, less and flagrant, of the provisions of the to protect there who statutes under which the bishops were enheretical. abled to proceed, might have led them to reconsider the equity of persecution in itself; or, at least, to remove from the office of judges persons who had shown themselves so signally unfit to exercise that affice. It would have been indecent, however, if not impossible, to transfer to a civil tribunal the cognizance of opinion; and, on the other hand, there was as yet among the upper classes of the laity no kind of disposition to be lenient towards those who were really unorthodox. The desire so far was only to check the reckless and random accusations of persons whose offence was to have criticised, not the doctrine, but the moral conduct of the church authorities. The Protestants. although from the date of the meeting of The treesthe parliament and Wolsey's fall their ulti- loss thus mate triumph was certain, gained nothing in revolution which is immediate consequences. They suffered the latter was a few of the latter was a few of was a few o rather from the eagerness of the political reformers to clear themselves from complicity with heterodoxy; and the bishops were even taunted with the spiritual dissensions of the realm as an evidence of their indolence and misconduct.1 Language of this kind boded ill for the "Christian Brethren"; and the choice of Wolsey's successor for the office of chancellor soon confirmed their apprehensions: Wolsey had chastised them with whips; Sir Thomas More would Sir Thomas chastise them with scorpions; and the philos- chancellesopher of the Utopia, the friend of Erasmus, ship. whose life was of blameless beauty, whose genius was cultivated to the highest attainable perfection, was to prove to the world that the spirit of persecution is no peculiar attribute of the pedant, the bigot, or the fanatic, but may coexist with the fairest graces of the human character. The lives of remarkable men usually illustrate some emphatic truth. Sir Thomas More may be said to have lived to illustrate the necessary tendencies of Romanism in an honest mind convinced of its truth; to show that the test of sincerity The true in a man who professes to regard orthodoxy certy in a man an essential of salvation, is not the readipess to endure persecution, but the courage which will venture to inflict it.

1 Petition of the Commons, Vol. I. cap. 1.

² Ibid. And, as we saw in the bishops' reply, they considered their practice in these respects wholly defensible. — See Reply of the Birham, top. 3.

The seals were delivered to the new chancellor in November, 1529. By his oath on entering office he was bound to exert himself to the utmost for the suppression of heretics: 1 he was bound, however, equally to obey the conditions under which the law allowed them to be suppressed. Unfortunately for his reputation as a judge, he permitted the hatred of "that kind of men," which he did not conceal that he felt,2 to obscure his conscience on this important feature of his duty, and tempt him to imitate the worst iniquities of the bishops. I do not intend in this place to relate the stories of his cruelties in his house at Chelsea,2 which he himself partially denied, and which at least we may hope were exaggerated. Being obliged to confine myself to specific instances, I choose rather those on which the evidence is not open to question; and which prove against More, not the zealous execution of a cruel law, for which we may not fairly hold him responsible, but a disregard, in the highest degree censurable, of his obligations as a judge.

¹ Petition of the Commens, one 5.

RO

The acts under which heretics were liable to punishment, were the 15th of the 2d of Henry IV., and the 1st of the 2d of Henry V.

By the act of Henry IV., the bishops were bound to bring offenders to trial in open court, within three months of their arrest, if there were no lawful impediment. If conviction follows three three tion. Except under these conditions, they were not at liberty to imprison.

By the act of Henry V., a heretic, if he was first indicted before a secular judge, was to be

^{1 9} Hon. V. stat. 1.

[&]quot; He had been "troublesome to heretics," he said, and he had "does it with a little ambition; " for "he so hated this kind of men, that he would he the sorest enemy that they could have, if they would not expent." — More's lafe of More, p. 211.

See Foxes, Vel. IV. pp. 489, 698, 705.

delivered within ten days for, if possible, a better the shorter period) to the bishop, " to be acquit the soomes or convict" by a jury in the spiritual court, to be delivand to be dealt with accordingly.1

bishopa

The secular judge might detain a heretic for days. ten days before delivering him to the bishop. The bishop might detain him for three months before his trial. Neither the secular judge nor the bishop had power to inflict indefinite imprisonment at will while the trial was delayed; nor, if on the trial the bishop failed in securing a conviction, was he at liberty to detain the accused person any longer on the same charge, because the result was not satisfactory to himself. These provisions were not preposterously lenient. Sir Thomas More should have found no difficulty in ob- More's tareserving them himself, and in securing the observance of them by the bishops, at least in visions. cases where he was himself responsible for the first committal. It is to be feared that he forgot that he was a judge in his eagerness to be a partisan, and permitted no punctilious legal scruples to interfere with the more important object of ensuring punishment to

The first case which I shall mention is one in which the Bishop of London was principally guilty; not, however, without More's countenance, and, if Foxe is to be believed, his efficient support.

In December, 1529, the month succeeding his appointment as chancellor, More, at the in- case of stance of the Bishop of London, arrested a Philips. citizen of London, Thomas Philips by name, on a charge of heresy.

The prisoner was surrendered in due form to his 2 Hen. V. 1tat. I. 2 John Stokesley.

TOL. IL.

heretics.

diocesan, and was brought to trial on the 4th of Febru ary; a series of articles being alleged against him by Foxford, the bishop's vicar-general. The articles were of the usual kind. The prisoner was accused of having used unorthodox expressions on transubstantiation, on pargatory, pilgrimages, and confession. appear whether any witnesses were produced. vicar-general brought his accusations on the ground of general rumour, and failed to maintain them. Whether there were witnesses or not, neither the particular offences, nor even the fact of the general rumour, could be proved to the satisfaction of the jury. Philips himself encountered each separate charge with a specific denial, declaring that he neither was, nor ever had been, other than orthodox; and the result of the trial was, that no conviction could be obtained. prisoner " was found so clear from all manner of infamous slanders and suspicions, that all the people before the said bishop, shouting in judgment as with one voice, openly witnessed his good name and fame, to the great reproof and shame of the said bishop, if he had not been ashamed to be ashamed." 1 The case had broken down; the proceedings were over, and by law the accused person was free. But the law, except when it was on their own side, was of little importance to the As they had failed to prove church authorities. Philips guilty of heresy, they called upon him to confess his guilt by abjuring it; "as if," he says, "there were no difference between a nocent and an innocent. between a guilty and a not guilty." !

He refused resolutely, and was remanded to prison,

Petition of Thomas Philips to the House of Commons: Bolle Money Mar.

a Rid.

in open violation of the law. The bishop, in conjunction with Sir Thomas More, sent for lum from time to time, submitting him to private examinations, which again were illegal; and urged the required confession, in order, as Philips says, "to save the bishop's credit."

The further they advanced, the more difficult it was to recede; and the bishop at length, irritated at his failure, concluded the process with an arbitrary sentence of excommunication. From this sentence, whether just or unjust, there was then no appeal, except to the pope. The wretched man, in virtue of it, was no longer under the protection of the law, and was committed to the Tower, where he languished for three prisoned years, protesting, but protesting fruitlessly, against the tyranny which had crushed him, remained and clamouring for justice in the deaf ears of pedants who knew not what justice meant.

If this had occurred at the beginning of the century, the prisoner would have been left to die, as countless multitudes had already died, unheard, uncared for, unthought of; the victim not of deliberate cruelty, but of that frightfullest portent, folly armed with power. Happily the years of his imprisonment had He appeals been years of swift revolution. The House of Commons had become a tribunal where of Commons of Commons and recovered whether the House of Commons and recovered his liberty.

1 Foxe, Vol. V. pp. 29, 30.

9 4 4 1

The circumstances are curious. Philips begged that he might have the benefit of the king's writ of corpus cum causa, and be brought to the ber of the House of Commons, where the Bishop of London should be subprensed to meet him. [l'etition of Thomas l'hilips: Rolls Rouse MS.] The Commons did not venture on so strong a measure; but a digest of the petition was sent to the Upper House, that the bishop might have an opportunity of reply. The Lords refused to receive or consider the ease.

The weight of guilt in this instance presses essentially on Stokesley; yet a portion of the blame The Sistem of London must be horne also by the chancellor, who first respondible to the fret placed Philips in Stokesley's hands; who took degree, but More was part in the illegal private examinations, and povetel: ennourable. who could not have been ignorant of the prisoner's ultimate fate. If, however, it be thought unjust to charge a good man's memory with an offence in which his part was only secondary, the following iniquity was wholly and exclusively his own. I relate the story without comment in the address of the injured person to More's successor.1

To the Right Hon. the Lord Chancellor of Eng-One of John land (Sir T. Audeley) and other of the King's Field: Council.

they replied that it was too "frivelous an affair" for so grave an assembly, and that they could not discuss it. [Lords' Journals, Vol. 1, p. 66.] A deputation of the Commons then waited privately upon the bishop, and being of course anxious to ascertain whether Philips had given a true version of what had passed, they begged him to give some written explanation of his conduct, which might be read in the Commons' House. [Lords' Journals, Vol. 1 p. 71.] The request was reasonable, and we cannot doubt that, if explanation had been possible, the bishop would not have failed to offer it; but he preferred to shield himself behind the judgment of the Lords. The Lords, he said, had decided that the matter was too frivolous for their own consideration, and without their permission, he might not set a precedent of responsibility to the Commons by answering their quantions.

This conduct met with the unanimous approval of the Peers. [Lords' Journals, Vol. I p. 71. Omnes processes tam spirituales quan temporales und voce dicebant, quod non consentaneum fult anquem procesum pendictorum alicui in co loco responserum.] The demand for explanation was treated as a breach of privilege, and the bishop was allowed to remain alicut. But the time was passed for conduct of this kind to be allowed to triumph. If the bishop could not or would not justify himself, his victim might at least be released from unjust imprisonment. The case was patered to the king, and by the king and the House of Communa Philips was not at liberty.

1 Petition of John Fleld: Rolls House MB

your poor bedeman John Field, how that the next morrow upon twelfth day, in the twenty-first year of our sovereign lord the King's Highness, Sir Thomas More, Knight, then being Lord Chancellor of England, did send certain of his servants, and caused your said beds man, with certain others, to be brought to his place at Chelsea, and there kept him (after what manner and fashion it were now long to tell), by the space of eigh teen days; and then set him at liberty, binding him to appear before him again the eighth day following in the Star Chamber, which was Candlemas eve; at which day your said bedeman appeared, and was then sent to the Fleet, where he continued until Palm Sunday two years after, [in violation of both the manny wstatutes,] kept so close the first quarter that have his keeper only might visit him; and always after closed up with those that were handled most straitly; often searched, sometimes even at midnight; besides mares and traps laid to take him in. Betwixt Michnelmas and Allhalloween tide next after his coming to prison there was taken from your bedeman a Greek vocabulary, price five shillings; Saint Cyprian's works, with a book of the same Sir Thomas More's making, named the Supplication of Souls. For what cause it was done he committeth to the judgment of God, that seeth the souls of all persons. The said Palm Sunday, which was also our Lady's day, towards night there came two officers of the Fleet, named George Porter and John Butler, and took your bedeman into a ward alone, and there, after long scarching, found his purse hanging at his girdle; which they took, and shook out the money to the sum of ten shillings, which was sent him to buy such necessaries as he lacked, and delivered him again his purse, well and truly keeping the money to themselves, as they said for their fees; and forthwith carried him from the Fleet (where he lost such poor bedding as he then had, and could never since get at), and delivered him to the Marshalsea, under our gracious sovereign's commandment and Sir Thomas More's. When the Sunday before the Rogation week following, your bedeman fell sick; and the Whitsun Monday was carried out on four men's backs, and delivered to his friends to be recovered if it so pleased God. At which time the keeper took for your bedeman's fees other ten shillings, when four shillings should have sufficed if he had been delivered in good health.

Jan. 1599-30

" Illogal. See 2 Hen. V. Stat. 2.

" Within three weeks it pleased God to set your bedeman on his feet, so that he might walk abroad. Whereof when Sir Thomas More heard (who went out of his chancellorship about the time your bedeman was carried out of prison), although he had neither word nor deed which he could ever truly lay to your bedeman's charge, yet made he such means by the Bishops of Winchester and London, as your bedeman heard say, to the Hon. Lord Thomas Duke of Norfolk, that he gave new commandment to the keeper of the Marshalsea to attach again your said bedeman; which thing was speedily done the Sunday three weeks after his deliverance. And so he continued in prison again until Saint Lawrence tide following; at which time money was given to the keeper, and some things he took which were not given, and then was your bedeman re delivered through the king's goodness, under sureties bound in a certain sum, that he should appear the first day of the next term following, and then day by day until his dismission. And so hath your bedeman been at liberty now twelve months waiting daily from term to term, and nothing laid to his charge as before.

"Wherefore, the premises tenderly considered, and also your said bedeman's great poverty, he most humbly beseecheth your goodness that he may now be clearly discharged; and if books, money, or other things seem to be taken or kept from him otherwise than justice would, eftsoons he beseecheth you that ye will command it to be restored.

"As for his long imprisonment, with other griefs thereto appertaining, he looketh not to have recompense of man; but committeth his whole cause to God, to whom your bedeman shall daily pray, according as he is bound, that ye may so order and govern the realm that it may be to the honour of God and your heavenly and everlasting reward."

I do not find the result of this petition, but as it appeared that Henry had interested himself in the story, it is likely to have been successful. We can form but an imperfect judgment on the merits of the case, for we have only the sufferer's ex parts complaint, and More might probably have been able to make some counter-statement. But the illegal imprisonment cannot be explained away, and cannot be palliated; and when a judge permits himself to commit an act of arbitrary tyranny, we argue from the known to the unknown, and refuse reasonably to give him credit for equity where he was so little careful of law.

Yet a few years of misery in a prison was but an insignificant misfortune when compared with the fate under which so many other poor men were at this time overwhelmed. Under Wolsey's chancellorship the stake had been comparatively idle; he possessed a remarkable power of making recantation easy; and there is, I believe, no instance in which an Contrast between Welaccused heretic was brought under his imvey and More in the treatment of mediate cognizance, where he failed to arrange some terms by which submission was made possible. With Wolsey heresy was an error -with More it was a crime. Soon after the seals changed hands the Smithfield fires recommenced; and, the chancellor acting in concert with them, the bishops resolved to obliterate, in these edifying spectacles, the recollection of their general infirmities. The crime of the offenders varied, sometimes it was a denial of the corporal presence, more often it was a reflection too loud to be endured on the character and habits of the clergy; but whatever it was, the alternative lay only between abjuration hum.liating as ingenuity could make it, or a dreadful death. The hearts of many failed them in the trial, and of all the confessors those perhaps do not deserve the least compassion whose weakness betrayed them, who sank and died broken-hearted. Of these silent sufferers history knows nothing. A few, unable to endure the misery of having, as they supposed, denied their Saviour, returned to the danger from which they had fled, and washed out their fall in martyrdom. Latimer has told us the story of his friend Bilney Troubles of --- little Bilney, or Saint Bilney,1 as he calls him, his companion at Cambridge, to whom he owed his own conversion. Bilney, after escaping through Wolsey's hands in 1627, was again cited in 1529 before the Bishop of London. Three times he refused He was offered a fourth and last chance.

Seventh Sermen before King Edward. First Sermen before the Duck-tes of Suffolk.

The temptation was too strong, and he fell. For two years he was hopelessly anserable; at length his braver nature prevailed. There was no pardon for a relapsed heretic, and if he was again in the bishop's bands he knew wel, the fate which awaited him.

He told his friends, in language touchingly significant, that "he would go up to Jerusalem"; He "goe up and began to preach in the fields. The journey which he had undertaken was not to be a long one. He was heard to say in a sermon, that of his personal knowledge certain things which had been offered in pilgrimage had been given to abandoned women. The priests, he affirmed, " take away the offerings, and hang them about their women's pecks; and after that they take them off the women, if they please them not, and hang them again upon the images." 1 This was Bilney's heresy, or formed the ground of his arrest, he was orthodox on the mass, and also on the power of the keys; but the secrets of the sacred order were not to be betrayed with impunity. He was seized, and hurried before the Bishop of Norwich; and being found heterodox on the papacy and the mediation of the saints, by the Bishop of Norwich he was sent to the stake.

Another instance of recovered courage, and of mar tyrdom consequent upon it, is that of James James Bainham, a barrister of the Middle Temple. ham,

This story is noticeable from a very curious circumstance connected with it.

Bainham had challenged suspicion by marrying the widow of Simon Fish, the author of the famous Beggars' Petition, who had died in 1528; and, soon after his marriage, was challenged to give an account of his faith. He was charged with denying transubstantiation, with questioning the value of the confessional, and the power of the keys; and the absence of authoritative Protestant dogma had left his mind free to expand to a yet larger belief. He had ventured to assert, that " if a Turk, a Jew, or a Saracen do trust in God and keep his law, he is a good Christian man," 1 — a conception of Christianity, a conception of Protestantism, which we but feebly dare to whisper even at the present day. The proceedings against him commenced with a demand that he should give up his books, and also the names of other barristers with whom he was suspected to have held intercourse. He refused; and in consequence his wife was imprisoned, and he himself was racked in the Tower by order of Sir Thomas More. Enfeebled by suffering, he was then brought before Stokesley, and terrified by the cold merciless eyes of his judge, he gave way, not about his friends, but about himself: he abjured, and was dismissed beartbroken, was on the seventeenth of February. He was only able to endure his wretchedness for a month. At the end of it, he appeared at a secret meeting of the Christian Brothers, in "a warehouse in Bow Lane," where he asked forgiveness of God and all the world for what he had done: and then went out to take again upon his shoulders the heavy burden of the cross.

1 Foxe, Vol. 1V. p. 649

The following Sunday, at the church of St. Augustine, he rose in his seat with the fatal English Testament in his hand, and "declared openly, before all the people, with weeping tears, that he had denied God," praying them all to forgive him, and

⁴ Articles against James Balmbant Foxe, Vol. IV. p. 708.

[121-32.]

beware of his weakness; "for if I should not return to the truth," he said, "this Word of God would damn me, body and soul, at the day of judgment." And then he prayed "everybody rather to die than to do as he did, for he would not feel such a hell again as he did feel for all the world's good." 1

Of course but one event was to be looked for; he knew it, and himself wrote to the bishop, telling him what he had done. No mercy was possible: he looked for none, and he found none.

Yet perhaps he found what the wise authorities thought to be some act of mercy. They The mercy could not grant him parden in this world the the upon any terms; but they would not kill him thatties. till they had made an effort for his soul. taken to the Bishop of London's coal-cellar at Fulham, the favourite episcopal penance-chamber, where he was ironed and put in the stocks; and there was left for many days, in the chill March weather, to bethink himself. This failing to work conviction, he was carried to Sir Thomas More's house at Chelsea, where for two nights he was chained to a post and whipped; thence, again, he was taken back to Fulham for another week of torture; and finally to the Tower, for a further fortnight, again with ineffectual whippings.

The demands of charity were thus satisfied. The pious bishop and the learned chancellor had exhausted their means of conversion; they had discharged their consciences; and the law was allowed to take its course. The prisoner was brought to trial on the 20th of April, as a relapsed heretic. Sentence followed; per hyper and on the last of the month the drama 1881.

¹ Foxe, Yol. IV. p 702.

closed in the usual manner at Smithfield. Before the fire was lighted Bainham made a farewell address to the people, laying his death expressly to More, whom he called his accuser and his judge.¹

It is unfortunately impossible to learn the feelings with which these dreadful scenes were wit-The Bellogs with which nessed by the people. There are stories which Unese apocshow that, in some instances, familiarity had produced the usual effect; that the martyrdom of saints was at times of no more moment to an English growd than the execution of ord nary felons, -that it was a more apectacle to the idle, the hardened, and the curious. On the other hand, it is certain that the behaviour of the sufferers was the argument which at last converted the nation; and an effect which in the end was so powerful with the multitude must have been visible long before in the braver and better natures. The increasing number of prosecutions in London shows, also, that the leaven was spreading. There were five executions in Smithfield between 1529 and 1533, besides those in the provinces. The prisons were crowded with offenders who had abjured and were undergoing sentence; and the list of those who were "troubled" in various ways is so extensive, as to leave no doubt of the sympathy which, in London at least, must have been felt by many, very many, of the spectators of the martyrs' deaths. We are left, in thus important point, mainly to conjecture; and if we were better furnished with evidence, the language of ordinary narrative would fail to convey any real notion of perplexed and various emotions. We have glimpses, however, into the inner world of men, here and there of strange interest; and we must regret that they are so ®w.

1 Foxe, Vol. 17 p. 706.

A poor boy at Cambridge, John Randall, of Christ's College, a relation of Foxe the martyrologist, such as destroyed himself in these years in religious bedge desperation; he was found in his study hanging by his girdle, before an open Bible, with his dead arm and finger stretched pitifully towards a passage on predestination.¹

A story even more remarkable is connected with Bainliam's execution. Among the lay offi- parter, the cials present at the stake, was " one Pavier," of London, town clerk of London. This Pavier was a himself, un Catholic fanatic, and as the flames were about destrange to be kindled he burst out into violent and stances. abusive language. The fire blazed up, and the dying sufferer, as the red flickering tongues licked the flesh from off his bones, turned to him and said, " May God forgive thee, and shew more mercy than thou, angry reviler, shewest to me." The scene was soon over; the town clerk went home. A week after, one morning when his wife had gone to mass, he sent all his servants out of his house on one pretext or another, a single girl only being left, and he withdrew to a garret at the top of the house, which he used as an oratory. A large crucifix was on the wall, and the girl having some question to ask, went to the room, and found him standing before it "bitterly weeping." He told her to take his sword, which was rusty, and clean it. She went away and left him; when she returned, a little time after, he was hanging from a beam, dead. He was a singular person. Edward Hall, the historian, knew him, and had heard him say, that "if the king put forth the New Testament in English, he would not live to bear it." And yet he could not bear to see a heretic die.

⁴ Foxe, Vol. IV p. 694.

^{*} Hall, p. 806; and see Foxe, Vol. IV p. 705.

What was it? Had the meaning of that awful figure hanging on the torturing cross sudden y revealed itself? If ad some inner voice asked him whether, in the prayer for his persecutors with which Christ had parted out of life, there might be some affinity with words which had lately sounded in his own cars? God, into whose hands he threw himself, self-condemned in his wretchedness, only knows the agony of that hour. Let the secret rest where it hes, and let us be thankful for ourselves that we live in a changed world.

Thus, however, the struggle went forward; a forlorn hope of saints led the way up the breach, and paved with their bodies a broad road into the new era, and the nation the meanwhile was unconsciously waiting tall the works of the enemy were won, and they could the two walk safely in and take possession. While men like Bilney and Bainham were teaching with words and writings, there were stout English hearts labouring also on the practical side of the same conflict, instilling the same lessons, and meeting for themselves the same consequences. Speculative superstition was to be met with speculative denial.
Practical idolatry required a rougher method of disenchantment.

Every monastery, every parish church, had in those The worsels days its special relics, its special images, its special something, to attract the interest of the people. The reverence for the remains of noble and pious men, the dresses which they had worn, or the bodies in which their spirits had lived, was in itself a natural and pious emotion; but it had been petrified into a dogma; and like every other imaginative feeling which is submitted to that had process, it had become a falsehood, a mere superstition, a substitute for piety, not a stimulus to it, and a perpetual occasion of fraud. The people brought offerings to the shrines where it was supposed that the relics were of greatest potency. The clergy, to secure the offerings, invented the relics, and invented the stories of the wonders which had been worked by them. The greatest exposure of these things took place at the visitation of the religious houses. In the meantime, Betop Bishop Shaxton's unsavoury inventory of inventory what passed under the name of rolles in the diocese of Salisbury, will furnish an adequate notion of these objects of popular veneration. There "be set forth and commended unto the ignorant people," he said, "as I myself of certain which he already come to my hands, have perfect knowledge, stinking boots, mucky combes, ragged rochettes, rotten girdles, pyl'd purses, great bullocks' horns, locks of hair, and filthy rags, gobbetts of wood, under the name of parcels of the holy cross, and such pelfry beyond estimation." Besides matters of this kind, there were images of the Virgin or of the Saints; above all, roods or crucifixes, of especial potency, the virtues of which had begun to The water grow uncertain, however, to sceptical Protes- roots. tants; and from doubt to demal, and from denial to passionate hatred, there were but a few brief steps. The most famous of the roods was that of The root of Boxley in Kent, which used to smile and bealey bow, or frown and shake its head, as its wors appear were generous or closehanded. The fortunes and misfortunes of this image I shall by and bye have to relate. There was another, however, at Dovercourt, The root of in Suffolk, of scarcely inferior fame. This Deverorart image was of such power that the door of the church in which it stood was open at all hours to all comers, and no human hand could close it. Dovercourt therefore became a place of great and lucrative pilgrimage, much resorted to by the neighbours on all occasions of difficulty.

⁴ Instructions given by the Bishop of Salisbury: Burnet's Collections, p. 493.

Not it happened that within the circuit of a few miles there lived four young men, to whom the powers the virtues of the rood had become greatly aitted क questionable. If it could work miracles, it must be capable, so they thought, of protecting its own substance; and they agreed to apply a practical test which would determine the extent of its abilities. Accordingly (about the time of Bainham's first imprisonment), Robert King of Dedham, Robert Debenham of Eastbergholt, Nicholas Marsh of Dedham, and Robert Gardiner of Dedham, "their consciences being burdened to see the honour of Almighty God so blasphemed by such an idol," started off "on a wondrous goodly night" in February, with hard frost and a clear full moon, ten miles across the wolds, to the church.

The door was open as the legend declared; but nothing daunted, they entered bravely, and lifting down the "idol" from its shrine, with egual to the its coat and shoes, and the store of tapers which were kept for the services, they carried it on their shoulders for a quarter of a mile from the place where it had stood, " without any resistance of the said idol." There setting it on the ground, they struck a light, fastened the tapers to the body, and with the help of them, sacrilegiously burnt the image The road is berrui. down to a heap of ashes; the old dry wood "blazing so brimly," that it lighted them a full mile of their way home.1

From a Letter of Robert Gardiner: Fexa, Vol. IV. p. 708.

For this night's performance, which, if the devil is the father of lies, was a stroke of honest work against him and his family, the world rewarded these men after the usual fashion. One of them, Robert Gardiner, escaped the search which was made, and disappeared till better times; the remaining three were made as winging in chains six months later on the the perpension of their exploit. Their fate was perhaps inevitable. Men who dare to be the first in great movements are ever self-immulated victims. But I suppose that it was better for them to be bleaching on their gibbets, than crawling at the feet of a wooden rood, and believing it to be God.

These were the first Paladins of the Reformation the knights who slew the dragons and the magnetic enchanters, and made the earth habitable for don. common flesh and blood. They were rarely, as we have said, men of great ability, still more rarely men of "wealth and station"; but men rather of clear Tyndal was a remarkable senses and honest hearts. person, and so Clark and Frith promised to become: but the two last were cut off before they had found scope to show themselves; and Tyndal remaining abroad, lay outside the battle which was being fought in England, doing noble work, indeed, and ending as the rest ended, with earning a martyr's crown; but taking no part in the actual struggle except with his pen. As yet but two men of the highest The two order of power were on the side of Protest men on the side of the Reformation.

Latimer and Cromwell. Of them made. we have already said something; but the time was now fast coming when they were to step forward, pressed by circumstances which could no longer dispense with them, into scenes of far wider activity; and the present seems a fitting occasion to give some closer account of their history. When the breach with the pope was made irreparable, and the papal party at home had assumed an attitude of suspended insurrection, the fortunes of the Protestants entered into a new phase The persecution ceased; and those who but lately were carrying fagots in the streets, or hiding for their lives, passed at once by a sudden alternation into The op-protecting resultion, the sunshine of political favour. and the use mer was but a brief one, followed soon by made of it. returning winter; but Cromwell and Latimer had together caught the moment as it went by; and before it was over, a work had been done in England which, when it was accomplished once, was accomplished for ever. The conservative party recovered their power, and abused it as before; but the chains of the nation were broken, and no craft of kings or priests or statesmen could weld the magic links again.

TOL. II

It is a pity that of two persons to whom England owes so deep a debt, we can piece together such scanty biographies. I must attempt, however, to give some outline of the little which is known.

The father of Latimer was a solid English yeoman, the family of Thurcaston, in Leicestershire. "He had no lands of his own," but he rented a farm the father of four pounds by the year," on which "he tilled so much as kept half a dozen mer." "he had walk for a hundred sheep, and meadow ground for thirty cows." The world prospered with him; he was able to save money for his son's education and his daughters' portions; but he was free-handed and hospitable, he kept open house for his poor neighbours; and he was a good citizen, too, for "he did find the king a harness with himself and his horse," ready to do battle for his country, if accasion called. His family were brought up "in godliness and the fear of the Lord;" and in all points the old Latimer seems to have been a worthy, sound, upright man, of the true English mettle.

1 Latimer's Sermens, p. 101.

There were several children. The Reformer was born about 1490, some five years after the The Robins usurper Richard had been killed at Bos- shoul 1400. worth. Bosworth being no great distance from Thurcaston, Latimer the father is likely to have been present in the battle, on one side or the other, - the right side in those times it was no easy matter to choose. but he became a good servant of the new government. - and the little Hugh, when a boy of seven years o.d. helped to buckle on his armour for him, "when he went to Blackheath field." Being a sol- And brought dier himself, the old gentleman was careful tombous to give his sons, whatever else he gave them, English toy a sound soldier's training. "He was diligent," says Latimer, " to teach me to shoot with the bow : he taught me how to draw, how to lay my body in the bow - not to draw with strength of arm, as other nations do, but with the strength of the body. I had my bows bought me according to my age and strength; as I increased in these, my bows were made bigger and bigger." 4 Under this education, and in the wholecome atmosphere of the farmhouse, the boy prespered well, and by and bye, showing signs of promise, he Letimer speaks of some and daughters. — Sermone, p. 101.

I Post

Where the Corolsh rebels came to an end in 1497 — Bacon's Hatory of Henry the Seventh.

Latimar's Sermons, p. 197

was sent to school. When he was fourteen, the promizes so far having been fulfilled, his father transferred him to Cambridge.

He was soon known at the university as a sober, hard-working student. At nineteen, he was المدومات وا fellow of elected fellow of Care Hall; at twenty, he took Clare Hall. and becomes his degree, and became a student in divinity, a divinity disdent. when he accepted quietly, like a sensible man. the doctrines which he had been brought up to believe. At the time when Henry VIII, was writing against Luther, Latimer was fleshing his maiden sword in an attack upon Melancthon; and he remained, Consucted from 11 this standow of he said, till he was thirty, " in darkness and death, 15 by the shadow of death" About this time he Bilney became acquainted with Bilney, whom he calls " the instrument whereby God called him to knowledge," In Bilney, doubtless, he found a sound instructor; but a careful reader of his sermons will see Bearess of Latimer's traces of a teaching for which he was ink sowledge, ar wildene debted to no human master. His deepest in his surent ng. knowledge was that which stole upon him un-

3 On which occasion, old relations perhaps shook their heads, and made objection to the expense. Some such feeling is indicated in the following glimpse behind the well of Latimer's private history:—

"I was once called to one of my kinsfelk, he says ("It was at that time when I had taken my degree at combridge; I was called, I say, to one of my kinsfelk which was very sick, and died immediately after my coming. Now, there was an old course of mine, which, after the man was died, gave me a was cardle in my hand, and commanded me to make certain crosses over him that was dead, for she thought the desil should run mway by and bye. Now, I took the candle, but I could not cross him an she would have mit to do; for I had never seen it before. She, perceiving I stud not do? with great anger took the candle out of my hand, saying, It is pity that thy father spendeth so much money upon thee;" and so use took the candle, and crossed and blusted him, so that he was sare escogh."—Latimer's Services, p. 499.

2 "I was as obsticate a papiet as any was in England, incomuch that, when I should be made Bachelor of Dremity, my whole cratica was against Phil p Melanethou and his opinions." — Latimer's Services, p. 884.

consciously through the experience of life and the world. His words are like the clear impression of a scal; the account and the result of observations, taken first hand. on the condition of the English men and women of his time, in all ranks and classes, from the palace to the prison. He shows large acquaintance with books; with the Bible, most of all; with patristic divinity and school divinity; and history, sacred and profane: but if this had been all, he would not have been the Latimer of the Reformation, and the Church of England would not, perhaps, have been here to-day. Like the physician, to whom a year of practical experience in a hospital teaches more than a life of closet study, Latimer learnt the mental disorders of his age in the age itself; and the secret of that art no other man, however good, however wise, could have taught him. He was not an echo, but a voice; and he drew his thoughts fresh from the fountain - from the facts of the era in which God had placed him.

He became early famous as a preacher at Cambridge, from the first, "a seditious fellow," to any reposition as a noble lord called him in later life, highly troublesome to unjust persons in authority. The lord called him in later life, highly troublesome to unjust persons in authority. The lord called him first into different decides and uncircumensed, ever went away from his preaching, it was said, without being affected with high detestation of sin, and moved to all godliness and virtue." And, in his audacious simplicity, he addressed himself always to his individual hearers, giving his words of himself always t

Jowel of Joy, p. 224, et seq.: Parket Society's edition. Latiener's Sermon, p. 5.

mity, when the Bishop of Ely came into the church, being curious to hear him. Mu offende the Mahop He-paused till the bishop was seated; and when he recommenced, he changed his subject, and drew an ideal picture of a prelate as a prelate ought to be; the features of which, though he did not say so, were strikingly unlike those of his auditor. The bishop complained to Wolsey, who sent for Latimer, and inquired what he had said. Latimer repeated the substance of his seranon; and other conversation then followed, which showed Wolsey very clearly the nature of the person with whom he was speaking. No eye saw more rapidly than the cardinal's the difference between a true man and an impostor; and he replied to the Bishop of Ely's accusations by granting the offender a licence to preach in any church in England. Wolany's indement on the bleboy's the Bishop of Ely cannot abide such doctrine ovaplaini. as you have here repeated," he said, "you shall preach it to his beard, let him say what he will." 1

Thus fortified, Latimer pursued his way, careless of the university authorities, and probably defi-Petotical character of ant of them. He was still orthodox in points Latinur's mind, which protected hist from of theoretic belief. His mind was practical rather than speculative, and he was slow in apaculation arriving at conclusions which had no immediate bearing upon action. No charge could be fastened upon him, definitely criminal; and he was too strong to be crushed by that compendious tyranny which treated as an act of heresy the exposure of imposture or delinquency.

On Wolsey's fall, however, he would have certainly been allenced: if he had fallen into the hands of Sir

1 Latimer's Remnies, pp. 97-31.

Thomas More, he would have perhaps been prematurely protector in the king. Henry heard of him, applicable eant for hom, and, with instinctive recognition of his character, appointed him one of the royal chaplains. He now left Cambridge and removed to Windsor, but only to treat his royal patron as freely is he had treated the Cambridge doctors, - not with any absence of respect, for he was most respectful, but with the highest respect which dares to speak unwelcome truth where the truth seems to be forgotten. was made chaplain in 1530 — during the new persecution, for which Henry was responsible by a more than tacit acquiescence. Latimer, with no author- Latimer atity but his own conscience, and the strong Henry to be half of the certainty that he was on God's side, threw Protestants. himself between the spoilers and their prey, and wrote to the king, protesting against the injustice which was crushing the truest men in his dominions. The letter is too long to insert; the close of it may show how a poor priest could dare to address the imperious Henry VIII. :

"I pray to God that your Grace may take heed of the worldly wisdom which is foolishness before God; that you may do that [which] God commandeth, and not that [which] seemeth good in your own sight, without the word of God; that your Grace may be found acceptable in his sight, and one of the members of his clurch; and according to the office that he hath called your Grace unto, you may be found a faithful minister of his gifts, and not a defender of his faith; for he will not have it defended by man or man's power, but by his word only, by the which he hath evermore defended it, and that by a way far above man's power or ceason.

"Wherefore, gracious king, remember yourself; have pity upon your soul; and think that the day is even at hand when you shall give account for your office, and of the blood that hath been shed by your sword. In which day, that your Grace may stand steadfastly, and not be ashamed, but be clear and ready in your reckoning, and have (as they say), your quietus est scaled with the blood of our Saviour Christ, which only serveth at that day, is my daily prayer to Him that suffered death for our sins, which also prayeth to 'is Father for grace for us continually; to whom be all honour and praise for ever. Amen. The Spirit of God preserve your Grace." 1

These words, which conclude an address of almost His interest unexampled grandeur, are unfortunately of no interest to us, except as illustrating the character of the priest who wrote them, and the king to whom they were written. The hand of the persecutor was not stayed. The rack and the lash and the stake continued to claim their victims. So far it was labour in vain. But the letter remains, to speak for ever for the courage of Latimer; and to speak something, too, for a prince that could respect the nobleness of the poor yeoman's son, who dared in such a cause to write to him as a man to a man. To have written at all in such a strain was as brave a step as was ever deliberately ventured. Like most brave acts, the increment it did not go unrewarded; for Henry remained ever after, however widely divided from him in opinion, his unshaken friend.

In 1531, the king gave him the living of West Kingston, in Wiltshire, where for a time he now retired. Yet it was but a partial rest. He had a special licence as a preacher from Cambridge, which continued to him (with the king's express He retires sanction) 1 the powers which he had received from Wolsey. He might preach in Wash Rh West Ringsany diocese to which he was invited; and preaches the repose of a country parish could not be the country. long allowed in such stormy times to Latimer. had bad health, being troubled with headache, pleurisy, colic, stone; his bodily constitution meeting feebly the demands which he was forced to make upon it. But he struggled on, travelling up and down to London, to Kent, to Bristol, wherever opportunity called him; marked for destruction by the bishops, if he was betraved into an imprudent word, and himself living in constant expectation of death.

Latimer's Remains, pp. 309-0.

At length the Bishop of London believed that Latimer was in his power. He had preached at St. Abb's, in the city, "at the request of a company of merchants," in the beginning of the winter of 1531; and soon after his return to his living, he was interested formed that he was to be cited before Stokes—s

¹ Latimer to Sir Edward Baynton: Letters, p. 329.

⁹ Letters, p. 823.

^{*} He thought of going abroad. "I have trust that God will help me," he wrote to a friend; "if I had not, I think the ocean sea should have divided my Lord of London and ma by this day." — Remains, p. 834.

Latimer to Sir Edward Baynton.

⁵ See Latimer's two letters to Sir Edward Bayaton : Romaine, pp. 133-451.

^{• &}quot;As ye say, the matter is weighty, and ought substantially to be

The citation was delayed for a few weeks. was issued at last, on the 10th of January. Japonery 10 1591-2,1 and was served by Sir Walter Hungerford, of Farley.3 The offences with which he was charged were certain "excesses and irregularities" not specially defined; and the practice of the Method of prosecution to surer of bishops in such cases was not to confine the Printle and prosecution to the acts committed, but to draw up a series of articles, on which it was presumed that the orthodoxy of the accused person was open to suspicion, and to question him separately upon each. Latimer was first examined by Stokesley; subsequently at various times by the bishops col-The charge against Latilectively; and finally, when certain formulas жоот фифconstant had been submitted to him, which he refused to sign, his case was transferred to convocation. The convocation, as we know, were then in difficulty with their premunare; they had consoled themselves in their sorrow with burning the body of Tracy; and they would gladly have taken further comfort by burning Latimer. He was submitted to the closest looked upon, even as weighty as my life is worth; but how to look substantially upon it etherwise know not I, then to pray my Lord God, day and night, that, as he hath emboldened me to preach his truth, so he will strengthen me to suffer for it.

"I pray you pardon me that I write no more distinctly for my head is (so) out of frame, that it would be too painful for me to write it again. If I be not prevented abortly, I intend to make marry with my parishioners, this Christman, for all the sorrow, lest perchance I never return to them again; and I have beard say that a doe is se good in winter as a buck in summer." Latimer to Sir Edward Boynton, p. 334.

1 Latener's Remains, p. 334.

Ibid. p. 350.

*I pray you, in God's name, what did you, so great fathers, so many, so long season, so oft assembled together? What went you about? What would ye have brought to pass? Two things takes away—the one that ye (which I heard) burned a dead man,—the other, that ye (which I felt) was about to burn one being alive. Take away these two noble acts, and thinself. They felt that he was the most dangerous person to them in the kingdom, and they laboured with unusual patience to ensure his conviction.\(^1\) With a common person they would have rapidly succeeded. But Latimer was in no haste to be a martyr; he would be martyred patiently when the time was come for martyrdom; but he felt that no one ought " to consent to the," as long as he could honestly live; \(^2\) The effects be and he baffled the episcopal inquisitors with the condetted was account of one of his interviews with them.

"I was once in examination," he says, " before five or six bishops, where I had much turmoiling. Latiner to-Every week, thrice, I came to examination, bloom and many snares and traps were laid to get something. Now, God knoweth, I was ignorant of the law; but that God gave me answer and wisdom what I should speak. It was God indeed, for else I had never escaped them. At the last, I was brought forth to be examined into a chamber hanged with arras, where I was before wont to be examined, but now, at this time, the chamber was somewhat altered; for whereas before there was wont ever to be a fire in the chimney.4 now the fire was taken away, and an arras hanging langed over the chimney; and the table stood near the chimney's end, so that I stood between the table and there is nothing also left that we went about that I know," See. Sec. — Ser-

¹ "My affair had some bounds susigned to it by him who sent for me up; out is now protracted by ratheate and wily examinations, as if it would never find a period; while sometimes one person, sometimes another, set me questions, without limit and without and."—Latimer to the Archbishap

of the technique. Remark at 250.

of Conterbury: Remove, p. 359.

now preached before the Convocation: Latimer's Sermont, p. 45.

Bernoins, p. 628.
 Bermons, p. 394.

[•] The wrocase bailed through January, February, and March.

the chimney's end. There was among these bishops that examined me one with whom I had been very familiar, and took him for my great friend, an aged man, and he sate next the table end. Then, among all other questions, he put forth one, a very subtle and crafty one, and such one indeed as I could not think so great danger in. And when I would make answer, ' I pray you, Master Latimer,' said he, ' speak out: I am very thick of hearing, and here be many that sit far off." I marvelled at this, that I was bidden to speak out, and began to misdeem, and gave an ear to the chimney; and, sir, there I heard a pen walking in the chimney, behind the cloth. They had appointed one there to write all mine answers; for they made sure work that I should not start from them: there was no starting from them; God was my good Lord, and gave me answer; I could never else have escaped The question was this: 'Master Latimer, do you not think, on your conscience, that you have been suspected of heresy? '-a subtle question - a very subtle question. There was no holding of peace would serve. To hold my peace had been to grant myself faulty. To answer was every way full of danger. But God, which hath always given me answer, helped me, or else I could never have escaped it. Ostendita mihi numisma censús. Shew me, said he, a penny of the tribute money. They laid snares to destroy him, but he overturneth them in their own traps." 1

The bishops, however, were not men who were nice in their adherence to the laws; and it would have gone ill with Latimer, notwithstanding his dialectic ability. He was excommunicated and imprisoned, and would soon have fallen into worse extremities; but at the last moment he appealed to the king, and the king, who knew his value, would not allow him Example to be sacrificed. He had refused to sub- and is mived scribe the articles proposed to him. Henry intimated to the convocation that it was not his pleasure that the matter should be pressed further; they were to content themselves with a general submission, which should be made to the archbishop, without exacting more special acknowledgments. This was the reward to Latimer for his noble letter. He was absolved, and returned to his parish, though snatched as a brand out of the fire.

¹ Agranoms, p. 294.

Soon after, the tide turned, and the Reformation entered into a new phase.

Such is a brief sketch of the life of Hugh Latimer, to the time when it blended with the broad stream of English history. With respect to the other very great man whom the exigencies of the state called to power simultaneously with him, our information is far less tatisfactory. Though our knowledge of Latimer's early story comes to us in fragments only, yet there are certain marks in it by which the outline can be determined with certainty. A cloud rests over the youth and early manhood of Thomas Cromwell, through which, Thomas Only at intervals, we catch glimpses of authentic facts; and these few fragments of reality seem rather to belong to a romance than to the actual life of a man.

Cromwell, the malleus monachorum, was of got! English family, belonging to the Cromwells of the constitution of Lincolnshire. One of these, probably a Cromwells of Lincoln, of Lincoln, and shire, does not the condon and shire, does not condon and shire.

¹ He subscribed all except two—one apparently on the power of the pope, the other I am unable to conjecture. Compare the Articles them-enter — printed in Latiner's Remains, p. 466 — with the Sermon before the Convocation. — Sermons, p. 44; and Burnet, Vol. III. p. 1.6.

conducted an ironfoundry, or other bus, less of that description, at Putney. He married a lady of respectable connexions, of whom we know only that she was sister of the wife of a gentleman in Derbyshire, but whose name does not appear.1 The old Cromwell dying early, the widow was reillia motber married to a cloth-merchant; and the child of the first husband, who made himself to great a name in English story, met with the reputed fortune of a stepson, and became a vagabond in the wide world. The chart of his course wholly fails us. One day in later life he shook by the hand an old be.lringer at Sion House before a crowd of courtiers, and told them that " this man's father had given him many a dinner in his necessities." And a strange White story er his jour random account is given by Foxe of his havmey to Roma. ing joined a party in an expedition to Rome to obtain a renewal from the pope of certain immunities and indulgences for the town of Boston; a story which derives some kind of credibility from its connexion with Lincolnshire, but is full of incoherence and un-Following still the popular legend, we find hkelihood. him in the autumn of 1515 a ragged stripling en aderings. at the door of Frescobaldi's banking-house in Florence, begging for help. Frescobaldi had an establishment in London, with a large connexion there; and seeing an English face, and seemingly an The Florenhonest one, he asked the boy who and what "I am, sir," quoth he, "of England, and my name is Thomas Cromwell; my father is a poor man, and by occupation a clothshearer; I am strayed from my country, and am now come into Italy with the camp of Frenchmen that were overthrown at Garigliano, where I was page to a footman, carrying after him his pike and barganet." Something in the boy's manner was said to have attracted the banker's interest; he took him into his house, and after keeping him there as long as he desired to stay, he gave him a horse and eixteen ducats to help him home to England.1 Foxe is the first English authority for the story, and Fezza took it from Bandello, the novelist: but it is confirmed by, or harmonizes with, a sketch of Cromwell's early Life in a letter of Chappuys, the imperial ambassador, to Chancellor Granvelle. "Master Cromwell." wrote Chappuys in 1535, "is the son of a poor blacksmith, who lived in a small village four miles from London. and is buried in a common grave in the parish churchyard. In his youth, for some offence, he was impulsoned, and had to leave the country. He went to Flanders, and thence to Rome and other places in Italy." 2

² Nicholas Gloscop to Cromwall: Ellis, third series, Vol. II. p. 237.

Where he was known among the English of the day as Master Prinkytell.

Returning to England, he married the daughter of a woollen-dealer, and became a partner in the business, where he amassed or inherited a considerable fortune. Circumstances afterwards brought him, while still young, in contact with Wolsey, who discovered his ment, took him into service, and in 1525 He tinds his employed him in the most important work of way late the visiting and breaking up the small monasteries, which the pope had granted for the foundation of the new colleges. He was engaged with this busi-nose for two years, and was so efficient that he obtained an unpleasant notoriety, and complaints of his conduct found their way to the king. Nothing came of these complaints, however, and Cromwell remained with the cardinal till his fall.

¹ See Ferre, Vol. V. p. 892.

Statute Chappays to Chanceller Granvelle: MS. Arctes. Brussh: Pit-g. im, p. 100.

^{*} See Cromwell's will in an appendix to this chapter This decument, fately found in the Rolls Hruse, furnishes a clue at last & the connexions of the Cremwell family.

It was then that the truly noble nature which was in him showed itself. He accompanied his abba confinement at master through his dreary confinement at the outward wretchedness of it; and at the meeting of parliament, in which he obtained a next, he rendered him a still more gallant service. The Lords had passed a bill of impeachment against Wolsey, violent, vindictive, and malevolent. It was to be submitted to the Commons, and Cromwell prepared to attempt an oppo-

2 Are we to believe Foxe's story that Comwell was with the Duke of Bourbon at the storming of Rome in May, 1527? See Poxe, Vol. V p. 266. He was with Weleny in January, 1697. See Ellie, third series, Vol. II. p. 117. And he was again with him early in 1526. In it thely that he was in Italy on such an occasion in the interval? Foxe speaks of it as one of the random exploits of Cromwell's youth, which is obviously untrue; and the natural impression which we gather is, that he was confusing the expedition of the Duke of Bourbon with some entire sampaign. On the other hand Foxe's authority was Cranmer, who was likely to know the truth, and it is not impossible that, in the critical state of italian politica, the English government might have dethed to have some confidential agent in the Dake of Bourhou's comp. Cremwell, with his knowledge of Italy and Italian, and his adventurous ability, was a likely man to have been seat on such an employment; and the story gains additional probability from another legend about him, that he once myed the life of file John Russell, in some secret affair at Bologna. See boxe, Vol. Y. p. 867. Now, although Sir John Russell had been in Italy several times before the was at the Bettle of Pavia, and had been employed in various diplomatic missions), and Cromwell might thus have readered him the service in question on an earlier occasion, yet he certainly was in the Espel States, on a most secret and dangerous musion, in the months preceding the coption of Rome. State Papers, Vol. VI p. 540, &c. The probabilities may man for what they are worth till further discovery

* A damp, unfurnabed house belonging to Welmy, where he was enfored to remain till the government had determined upon their course towards how. See Cayendish.

nition. Cavendish has left a most of aracteristic description of his leaving Esher at this trying time. A cheerless November evening was closing in with some at rain and storm. Wo.sey was broken down Taher. with sorrow and sickness; and had been unusually tried by parting with his retinue, whom he had sent home, as unwilling to keep them attached any longer to his fallen fortunes. When they were all gone, " My lord," says Cavendish, "returned to his chamber, lamenting the departure of Lis servants, making his moan unto Master Cromwell, who comforted convers him the best he could, and desired my lord to less that he give him leave to go to London, where he make or make would either make or mar before he came again, which was always his common saying. Then after long communication with my lord in secret, he departed, and took his horse and rode to London; at whose departing I was by, whom he bade farewell, and said, ye shall hear shortly of me, and if I speed well I will not fail to be here again within these two days." 1 He did speed well. " After two days he came again with a much pleasanter countenance, and meeting with me before he came to my lord, said unto me, that he had adventured to put in his foot where he trusted shortly to be better regarded or all were done." He had He defeate stopped the progress of the impeachment in the attempts of impeachment in the impeachment in the attempts of impeachment in the articles one by one. In the evening he rade common, down to Esher for instructions. In the morning he was again at his place in Parliament; and he conducted the defence so skilfully, that finally he threw out the bill, saved Wolsey, and himself "grew into such estimation in every man's opinion, for his honest behaviour in his master's cause, that he was esteemed the most faithfullest servant, [and] was of all men greatly commended." 1

¹ Cavendish, pp. 269, 270.

TOL IL

Henry admired his chivalry, and perhaps his talent. The loss of Wolsey had left him without any and passed into the servery able man, unless we may consider Sir thes of the Thomas More such, upon his council, and he could not calculate on More for support in his anti-Roman policy; he was glad, therefore, to avail himself of the service of a man who had given so rare a proof of fidelity, and who had been trained by the ablest statesman of the age.2

To Wolsey Cromwell could render no more service except as a friend, and his warm friend he remained to the last. He became the king's secretary, representing the government in the House of Commons, and was at once on the high road to power. I cannot call him ambitious; an ambitious man would scarcely have pursued so refined a policy, or have calculated on the admiration which he gained by adhering to a fallen minister. He did not seek greatness, - greatness rather sought him as the man in England most fit to bear it. His business was to prepare the measures which were to be submitted to Parliament by the government. His influence, therefore, grew necessarily with the rapidity with which events were ripening; and when the conclusive step was taken, and the king was married, the virtual conduct of the Reformation passed into his hands. His Protestant tendencies

Cavendiah, p. 976.

Dhappuys says, that a quarrel with Sir John Wallop first introduced Cromwell to Henry. Cromwell, "not knowing how else to defend himself, contrived with presents and entreaties to obtain an audience of the king, whom he promised to make the richest sovereign that ever reigned in Engiand." - Chappuys to Granvelle: The Pilgrem, p. 107.

1431-1.]

were unknown as yet, perhaps, even to his own conscience; nor to the last could be arrive at any certain speculative convictions. He was drawn towards the Protestants as he rose into power by the integrity of his nature, which compelled him to trust only those who were honest like himself.

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER VI.

WILL OF THOMAS CROMWELL -- 1529.

In the name of God, Amen. The 12th day of July, in the year of our Lord God MCCCCCXXIX, and in the 21st year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord, King Henry VIII., I, Thomas Cromwell, of London, Gentleman, being whole in body and in good and perfect memory, lauded be the Holy Trinity, make, ordain, and declare this my present testament, containing my last will, in manner as following: -First I bequeath my soul to the great God of heaven, my Maker, Creator, and Redeemer, beseeching the most glorious Virgin and blessed Lady Saint Mary the Virgin and Mother, with all the hely company of heaven to be mediators and intercessors for me to the Holy Trinity, so that I may be able, when it shall please Almighty God to call me out of this miserable world and transitory life, to inherit the kingdom of heaven amongst the number of good Christian people; and whenseever I shall depart this present life I bequeath my body to be buried where it shall please God to ordain me to die, and to be ordered after the discretion of mine executors undernamed. And for my goods watch our Lord hath lent me in this world. I will shall be ordered and disposed in manner and form as her after shall ensue. First I give and bequeath unto my son Gregory Cromwell cir hundred threescore six pounds, thirteen shillings, and fourpence, of lawful money of England, with the which six hundred threescore eix pounds, thirteen skillings, and fourpence. I will mine executors undernamed immediately or an soon as they conveniently may after my decease, shall purthase lands, tenements, and hereditaments to the clear yearly value of 33% &s. &d. by the year above all charges and reprises to the use of my said son Gregory, for term of his life; and after the decease of the said Gregory to the heirs male of his body lawfully to be begotten, and for lack of heirs male of the body of the said Gregory, lawfully begotten, to the heirs general of his body lawfully begotten. And for lack of such hears to the right beers of me the said Thomas Cromwell, in fee. I will also that immediate y and as soon as the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall be so purchased after my death as is aforesaid by mine executors, that the yearly profits thereof shall be wholly spent and employed in and about the education and finding honestly of my said son Gregory, in virtue, good learning, and manpers, until such time as he shall come to the full age of 24 years. During which time I heartily desire and require my said executors to be good unto my said son Gregory, and to see he do lose no time, but to see him virtuously ordered and brought up according to my trust.

Item. I give and bequeath to my said son Gregory. (when he shall come to his fall age of 24 years,) two hundred pounds of lawful English money to order them as our Lord shall give him grace and discretion, which 200% I will shall be put in surety to the intest the same may come to his hands at his said age of 24 years. Item. I give and bequeath to my said son Gregory of such household stuff as God bath lent me, three of my best featherbeds with their bolsters; 2d, the best pair of blankets of fustion, my best poverlet of tapestry, and my quilt of yellow Turkey sating one pair of my best sheets, four pillows of down, with four pair of the best pillowheres, four of my best table-cloths, four of my best towels, two dozen of my finest napkins, and two dozen of my other napking two garnish of my best vessel, three of my best brass pots, three of my best brass pans, two of my best kettles, two of my best spits, my best joined hed of Flanders work, with the best ---- and tester, and other the appurtenances thereto belonging; my best press, carven of Flanders work, and my best cupboard, carven of Flanders work, with also six joined stools of Flanders work, and six of my best cushions. Item. I give and bequeath to my said son Gregory a basin with an ewer parcel-gilt, my best salt gilt, my best cup gilt, three of my best goblets; three other of my goblets parcel-gilt, twelve of my best ail ver spoons, three of my best drinking alepots gilt; all the which parcels of plate and household stuff I will shall be makely kept to the use of my said son Gregory till he shall come to his said full age of 24. And all the which piate, bousehold stuff, napery, and all other the premises, I will mine executors do put in safe keeping until my said son come to the said years or age of 24. And if he die before the age of 24, then I will all the said plate, vessel, and bousehold stuff shall be sold by mine executors. And the money thereof coming to be given and equally divided amongst my poor kinefo k, that is to say, amongst the children as well of mine own sisters Elizabeth and Katherine, as of my late wife's sister Joan, wife to John Williamson; and if it happen that all the children of my said sisters and sister-in-law do die before the partition be made, and none of them be hving then I will that all the said plate, vessel, and household stuff shall be sold and given to other my poor kinsfolk then being in life, and other poor and indigent people, in deeds of charity for my soul, my father and mother their souls, and all Christian souls.

[* Item. I give and bequeath to my daughter Anne an hundred marks of lawful money of England when she shall come to her lawful age or happen to be married, and 40% toward her finding until the time that she shall be of lawful age or be married, which 40% I will shall be delivered to my friend John Cook, one of the six Clerks of the King's Chancery, to the intent be may order the same and cause the same to be employed in the best wise he can devise about the virtuous education and bringing up of my said daughter till she shall come to her lawful age or marriage. will that the said 100 marks, and so much of the said 40f. as then thall be unspent and unemployed at the day of the double of my said daughter Anne, I will it shall remain to Gragory my son, if he then be in life; and if he be dead, the same hundred marks, and also so much of the said 40L as then shall be unspent, to be departed amongst my sisters' children, in manner and form aforesaid. And if it happen my mid sistern' children then to be all dead then I will the said 100 marks and so much of the said 40% as shall be unspent, shall be divided amongst my kinefolk, such as then shall be in l.fe. 1 Item. I give and bequeath unto my sister Elizabeth Wellyfed 40L, three goblets without a cover, a mager, and a nut. Item. I give and bequeath to my nephew Richard Willyams [1 servant with my Lord Marquess Dorset, 66l. 18s. 4d.], 40l. sterling, my [1 fourth] best gown, doublet, and jacket. Item. I give and bequeath to my nephew Christopher Wellyfed 401, [1201] my fifth gown, doublet, and jacket. Item. I give and bequeath to my nephew William Wellyfed the younger 20L, [140L] Item I give and bequeath to my niece Alice Wellyfed, to her marriage, 204. And if it happen her to die before marriage, then I will that the said 20% shall remain to her brother Christopher. And if it happen him to die, the same 20% to remain to Wm. Wellyfed the younger, his brother. And if it happen them all to die before their lawful age or marriage, then I will that all their parts shall remain to Gregory my son. And if it happen him to die before them, then I will all the so d parts shall remain [* to Anne and Grace, my daughters] to Richard Willyans and Walter Willyams, my nephews. And if it happen them to die, then I will that all the said parts shall be distributed in deeds of charity for my soul, my father's and mother's souls, and all Christian souls. Item. I give and bequeath to my mother-in-law Mercy Prior 400,

¹ Or Willyams. The words are used indifferently.

The cigare on closed between brackets is struck through.

1 Struck through.

of lawful English money, and her chamber, with certain household stuff; that is to say, a featherhed, a bolster, two pillows with their berea, six pair of alterta, a pair of blankers, a garnish of vessel, two pots, two pans, two spits, with such other of my household stuff as shall be thought meet for her by the discretion of mine executors, and such as she will reasonably desire, not being bequeathed to other uses in this my present testament and last will. Item. I give and bequeath to my said mother-in-law a little salt of silver. a mazer, six silver spoons, and a drinking-pot of silver. And also I charge mine executors to be good unto her during her life. Item. I give and bequeath to my brother-inlaw William Wellyfed, 201, my third gown, jacket, and doublet. Item. I give and bequeath to John Willyams my brother-in-law, 100 marks, a gown, a doublet, a jacket, a featherbed, a bolster, six pair of sheets, two table-cloths, two dozen napkius, two towels, two brass pots, two brass pans, a silver pot, a nut parcel-gilt; and to Joan, his wife, 40% Item. I give and bequeath to Joan Willyams, their daughter, to her marriage, 20L, and to every other of their children 124 13s. 4d. Item. I bequeath to Walter Willyams, my nephew, 201 Item. I give and bequeath to Ralph Sadler, my servant, 200 marks of lawful English money, my second gown, jacket, and doublet, and all my books. Item. I give and bequeath to Hugh Whalley, my servant, 62. 13s. 4d. Item, I give and bequeath to Stephen Vaughan, sometime my servant, 100 marks, a gown, jacket, and doublet. Item. I give and bequeath to Page, my servant, otherwise called John De Pount, 6L 13s. 4d. [1 Item. I give and bequeath to Elizabeth Gregory, sometime my servant, 201., are pair of sheets, a featherbed, a pair of blankets, a coverlet, two table-cloths, one dozen ampkins, two brass pots, two pans, two spits.] And also to Thomas Averey, my servant, 62 184. 4d, [1 Item. I give and bequeath to John Cooke, one of the six Master Clerks of the Chancery, 10%, my second gown, doublet, and jacket. Item. I give and bequeath to

1 Struck through.

Roger More, servant of the King's bakehouse, the 18s. 4d., three yards of satin; and to Maudelya, his wife, 3l. 8a. 8d.] Item. I give and bequeath to John Horwood, 62. 13s. 4d. [1 Item. I give and bequeath to my little daughter Grace 100 marks of lawful English money when she shall come to her lawful age or marriage; and also 40% towards her exhibition and finding until such time she shall be of lawful age or be married, which 40% I will shall be delivered to my brother-in-law. John Willyams, to the intent he may order and cause the same to be employed in and about the virteous education and bringing up of my said daughter, till sho shall come to her lawful age or marriage. And if it happen my said daughter to die before she come to her lawful age or macriage, then I will that the said 100 marks, and so much of the said 40% as shall then be unspent and unemployed about the finding of my said daughter at the day of the death of my said daughter shall remain and be delivered to Gregory my son, if he then shall happen to be in life; and if he be dead, then the said 100 marks, and the said residne of the said 404, to be evenly departed among my grown kinsfolk - that is to say, my sisters' children aforesaid] Item. That the rest of mine apparel before not given or bequeathed in this my testament and last will shall be given and equally departed amongst my servants after the order and discretion of mine executors. Item. I will also that mine executors shall take the yearly profits above the charges of my farm of Carberry, and all other things contained in my said lease of Carberry, in the county of Middlesex, and with the profits thereof shall yearly pay unto my brother-in-law William (Wellyfed) and Elizabeth his wife, mine only sister, twenty pounds; give and distribute for my soul quarterly 40 shillings during their lives and the longer of them; and after the decrease of the said William and Elizabeth, the profits of the said farm over and above the yearly rent to be kept to the use of my son Gregory till he be come to the age of 24 years. And at the years of 24 the said leave and farm of Carberry, I do give and bequeath to my son Gregory, to have the same to him, his executors and assigns. And if it fortune the said Gregory my son to die before, my said brother-in-law and sister being doad, he shall come to the age of 24 years, then I will my said cousir Richard Willyams shall have the farm with the appurtenances to him and to his executors and assigns; and if it happen my said brother-in-law, my sister, my son Gregory, and my said cousin Richard, to die before the accomplishment of this my will touching the said farm, then I will mine executors shall sell the said farm, and the money thereof coming to employ in deeds of charity, to pray for my sou, and all Christian souls. Item. I will mine executors shall conduct and here a priest, being an honest person of continent and good living, to sing for my soul by the space of seven years. pext after my death, and to give him for the same $4. 13s. 4d, for his stipend. Item, I give and bequeath towards the making of highways in this realm, where it shall be thought most necessary, 20% to be disposed by the discretion of mine executors. Item. I give and bequeath to every the five orders of Friars within the City of London, to pray for my soul, 20 shillings. Item. I give and bequeath to 60 poor maidens in marriage, 40L, that is to say, 13s. 4d. to every of the said poor maidens, to be given and distributed by the discretion of mine executors. Item. I will that there shall be dealt and given after my decease amongst poor people householders, to pray for my soul, 20%, such as by mine executors shall be thought most needful. Item. I give and bequesth to the poor parishioners of the parish where God thall ordain me to have my dwell applace at the time of my death, 10%, to be truly distributed amongst them by the discretion of mine executors. Item. I give and bequeath to my parish church for my tithes forgotten, 20 shillings. To the poor prisoners of Newgate, Ludgate, King's Bench, and Marshalsen, to be equally distributed amongst them,

1 Struck through.

Willing, charging, and desiring mine executors underwritten that they shall see this my will performed in every point according to my true meaning and intent as they will answer to God, and discharge their consciences. The residue of all my goods, chattels, and debts not bequeathed, my funeral and burial performed, which I will shall be done without any earthly pomp, and my debts paid, I will shall be sold, and the money thereof coming, to be distributed in works of charity and pity, after the good discretion of mine executors undernamed. Whom I make and ordain, Stephen Vaughan, Ralph Sadier, my servants, and John Willyams my brother-in-law. Praying and desiring the same mine executors to be good unto my son Gregory, and to all other my poor friends and kinsfolk and servants aforenamed in this my testament. And of this my present testament and last will I make Roger More mine overseer; unto whom and also to every of the other mine executors I give and bequeath 61. 19s. 4d. for their pains to be taken in the execution of this my last will and testament, over and above such legacies as berebefore I have bequeathed them in this same testament and will. In witness whereof, to this my present testament and last will I have set to my hand in every leaf contained in this book, the day and year before limited. THOMAS CROMWELL.

Item. I give and bequeath to William Brabazon, my servant, 20f. 8s., a gun, a doublet, a jacket, and my second gelding.

It to John Avery, Yeoman of the Bedchamber with the King's Highness, 6L 13s. 4d., and a doublet of satin.

It. to Thurston, my cook, 64. 18s. 4d.

It. to William Body, my servant, 6l. 13s. 4d.

It. to Peter Mewtas, my servant, 61. 13s. 4d.

It to Ric. Sleysh, my servant, 61. 13s. 4d.

It to George Wilkinson, my servant, 64 13s. 4d.

It to my friend, Thomas Alvard, 10%, and my best geld-

L. to my friend, Thomas Rush, 10%

It. to my servant, John Hynde, my horsekeeper, 34. 6a. 6d.

Item. I will that mine executors shall safely keep the patent of the manor of Romney to the use of my son Gregory, and the money growing thereof, till he shall come to his lawful age, to be yearly received to the use of my said son, and the whole revenue thereof coming to be truly paid into him at such time as he shall come to the age of 24 years.

CHAPTER VIL

THE LAST EFFORTS OF DIPLOMACY.

I HAVE now to resume the thread of the political history where it was dropped at the sentence of divorce prenounced by Cranmer, and the coronation of the new queen. The effect was about to be ascertained of these bold measures upon Europe; and of what their effect would be, only so much could be foretold with certainty, that the time for trifling was past, and the pope and Francis of France would be compelled to declare their true intentions. If these intentions were honest, the subordination of England to the papacy might be still preserved in a modified form. The papal jurisdiction was at end, but the spiritual supremacy of the Bishop of Rome, with a diminished but considerable revenue attached to it, remained unaffected; and it was for the pope to determine whether, by fulfilling at ast his original engagements, he would preserve these remnants of his power and privileges, or boldly take up the gage, excommunicate his disobedient subjects, and attempt by force to bring them back to their allegiance.

The news of what had been done did not take him wholly by surprise. It was known at Brussels at the end of April that the king had married. The queen regent spoke of it to the ambassador sternly and significantly, not concealing ber expectation of the mortal resentment which The king's marriage Huspeit Clement would be felt by her brothers; 1 and the information was forwarded with the least possiin decays ble delay to the cardinals of the imperal faction at Rome. The true purposes which underlay the contradiction of Clement's language are undiscoverable. Perhaps in the past winter he had been acting out a deep intrigue - perhaps be was drifting between riva. currents, and yielded in any or all directions as the alternate pressure varied; yet whatever had been the meaning of his language, whether it was a scheme to deceive Henry, or was the expression only of weakness and good-nature desiring to avoid a quarrel to the latest moment, the decisive step which had been taken in the marriage, even though it was nominally undivulged,

¹ Mary, widow of Louis of Hungary, sister of the emperor, and Regent of the Netherlands

I She was much affected when the first intimation of the marriage reached her. "I may informed of a quest friend of mine," wrote fill John Hocket, "that when the queen here had read the letters which she received of late out of England, the many came to her eyes with very and countenance. But indeed this day when I spake to her she showed me mat such countenance, but told me that she was not well pleased.

"At her setting forward to ride at hunting, her Green asked me W I had heard of late any didings out of England. I teld her Grace, as it is tree, that I had note. She gave me a look as that she should marvel thereof, and and to me. 'Jay des nouvelles qui se me semblent poest trop bonses.' and told me touching the King's Highmon's marriage. To the which I governed for Grace and said, * Madama, jo us us doute point syl sat falst, at quand le veult grandre et entendes de bonne part et de aula chemys, sens porter faveur parentelle que ang le trouvers tout lente et bies raysonmable par layde de Dieu et de bonne conscience." Her Grace said te me again, "Morsieur l'ambamadeur, c'est Dieu qui le scalt que je vouldroye que le tout allysse blen, male ne seave semment l'empereur et le rey mou there entended at l'affaire car il touche a oulz taut que a moy." I answeret and said, "Madamo, il me semble estre assures que l'empereur et le rey peatre flure qui sont deux Princeys tres pradens et enyges, quent au aurunt considere indifferentement tout l'affaire qu'ile un le deveroyent prendre que de boune part." And hereunto her Grase made me unewer, saying, De quant de la presides de lemme part es la, no sayge M. l'ambassadout." - Backet to the Duke of Northike State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 408.

obliged him to choose his course and openly adhere to it. After the experience of the past, there could be no doubt what that course would be.

On the 12th of May a citation was issued against the King of England, summoning him to appear 25-7 12. by person or provy at a stated day. It had ded to ap been understood that no step of such a kind Rema. was to be taken before the meeting of the pope and Francis. Bennet, therefore, Henry's faithful secretary, hastily inquired the meaning of this measure. The pope told him that it could not be avoided, and the language which he used revealed to the English agent the inevitable future. The king, he said, had defied the inhibitory brief which had been lately issued, and had incurred excommunication; the imperialists insisted that he should be proceeded against for contempt, and that the excommunication should at once be pronounced. However great might be his own personal reluctance, it was not possible for him to remain passive; and if he declined to resort at once to the more extreme. The secure exercise of his power, the hesitation was supported enly till the emperor was prepared to experce one enforce the censures of the church with the electric them. strong hand. It stood not " with his honour to execute such censures," he said, "and the same not to be regarded." But there was no wish to spare Henry; and if Francis could be detached from his ally, and if the condition of the rest of Christendom Lecame such as to favour the enterprise, England might evidently look for the worst which the pope, with the Catholic powers, could execute. If the papal court was roused into so menacing a mood by the mere intimation of the secret marriage, it was easy to foresee what would ensue when the news arrived of the proceedings at Dunstable. Bennet entreated that the process should be delayed till the interview; but the pope answered coldly that he had done his best and could do no more; the imperialists were urgent, and he saw no reason to refuse their petition.1 This was Clement's usual language, but there was something planation peculiar in his manner. He had been often violent, but he had never shown resolution, and the English agents were perplexed. The mystery was soon explained. He had secured himself on the side of France; and Francis, who at Calais had told Henry that his negotiations with the sec of Rome were solely for the interests of England, that for Henry's sake he was marrying his son into a family beneath him in rank, that Henry's divorce was to form the especial subject of his conference with the pope, had consented to allow these dangerous questions to sink into a secondary place, and had relinquished his intention, if he had ever seriously entertained it, of becoming an active party in the English quarrel.

1 Biats Papers, Vol. VII. p. 457.

The long talked-of interview was still delayed. First it was to have taken place in the win-Beiny of the interview beter, then in the spring; June was the date Investa Ship pope and Prancis. last fixed for it, and now Bennet had to inform the king that it would not take place before September; and that, from the terms of a com-The true purposes of munication which had just passed between Plear. the parties who were to meet, the subjects liscussed at the conference would not be those which he had been led to expect. Francis, in answer to a question from the pope, had specified three things which he proposed particularly to "intreat." The first concerned the defence of Christendom against the Turks, the second concerned the general council, and the third concerned "the extinction of the Lutheran sect." These were the points which the Most Christian king was anxious to discuss with the pope. For the latter good object especially, "he would devise and treat for the provision of an army." In the King of England's cause, he trusted "some means might be found whereby it might be compounded;" but if persuasion failed, there was no fear lest he should have recourse to any other method.

*Sir Gregory Cassade to the Duke of Norfolk. Ad pondificem according most remonistike summs fult, vellet id prestare ut reconsistent regent nestrum certiorem facere possemus, in sub causa nihil innovatum iri. His life, sicut selet, respondit, nescire se quo paeto passit Casariania obsistare — $6.4s Papers, Vol. VII. p. 463.

It was this which had given back to the pope has courage. It was this which Bennet had now to report to Henry. The French alliance, it was too likely, would prove a broken reed, and pierce the hand that leant upon it.

Henry knew the danger; but danger was not a very terrible thing either to him or to his people. Proteble incation of If he had conquered his own reluctance to Excluding the risk a schism in the church, he was not likely to yield to the fear of isolation; and if there was something to alarm in the aspect of affairs, there was also much to encourage. His parliament was united and resolute. His queen was pregnant. The Nun of Kent had assigned him but a month to live after his marriage; six months had passed, and he was alive and well; the supernatural powers had not declared against him; and while safe with respect to enmity from above, the earthly powers he could afford to defy. When he finally divorced Queen Catherine, he must have foreseen his present position at least as a possibility, and if not prepared for so swift an apostasy in Francis, and if not yet wholly believing it, we Pranels. may satisfy ourselves he had never absolutely trusted a prince of metal so questionable.

Bennet to Henry: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 482.

The Duke of Norfolk was waiting at the French court, with a magnificent embassy, to represent the English king at the interview. The arrival of the pope had been expected in May. It was now delayed till September; and if Clement came after all, it would be for objects in which England had but small concern. It was better for England that there should be no meeting at all, than a meeting to devise schemes for the massacre of Lutherans. Henry therefore wrote to the Duke, telling him generally what he had heard from Rome: he mentioned the three topics which he underatood were to form the matter of discussion; but he skilfully affected to regard them as having originated with the imperialists, and not with the French king. In a long paper of instructions, in which carnestness and irony were strangely blended, he directed the ambassador to treat his good brother as if he were still exclusively devoted to the interests of England; and to urge upon him, on the ground of this fresh delay, that the interview should not take place at all.1

"Our pleasure is," he wrote, "that ye shall say that we be not a little moved in our The blog's hatru etlena heart to see our good brother and us, being to the Dake of Norfalk to such princes of Christendom, to be so handled with the pope, so much to our dishonour, and to the pope's and the emperor's advancement; seeming to be at the pope's commandment to come or tarry as

Letter undated, but written about the middle of Junes State Papers, fol VII. p. 474.

be or his cardinals shall appoint; and to depend up on his pleasure when to meet — that is to say, when he list or never. If our good brother and we were either suitors to make request, the obtaining whereof we did much set by, or had any particular matter of advantage to entreat with him, these proceedings might be the better tolerated; but our good brother having no particular matter of his own, and being that [no] more glory nor surety could happen to the emperour than to obtain the effect of the three articles The "Three moved by the pope and his cardinals, we think preposed in it not convenient to attend the pleasure of the will be wholly to the pope, to go or to abyde. We could have been advantage of content to have received and taken at the bepope's hand, jointly with our good brother, pleasure and friendship in our great cause; [but] on the other part, we cannot esteem the pope's part so high, as to have our good brother an attendant suitor therefore desiring him, therefore, in anywise to disappoint for his part the said interview; and if he have already granted thereto — apon some new good occasion, which he now undoubtedly bath — to depart from the same.

cause for us, with such an entire and whole Rebat consent of our nobility and commons of our superescent realm and subjects, and being all matters and the passed, and in such terms as they now be, do the passed, and in such terms as they now be, do the passed, and in such terms as they now be, do the passed and want of that the pope might do, with us or against us, as we would for the obtaining thereof be contented to have a French king our so perfect a friend, to be not only a mediator but a unitor therein, and a suitor attendant to have audience upon liking and after the advice of such cardinals as repute it among pastymes to play and dally with kings

and princes; whose honour, ye may say, is above all thurgs, and more dear to us in the person of our good brother, than is any piece of our cause at the pope's hands. And therefore, if there be none offer thing but our cause, and the other causes whereof we be advertised, our advice, counsel, special desire also and request is, [that our good brother shall] break of the interview, unless the pope will make suit to him; and [unless] our said good brother hath such causes of him own as may particularly tend to his own benefit, hon the there is and profit—wherein he shall do great how the our, and profit—wherein he shall do great and singular pleasure unto us; giving to not deritand to the pope, that we know ourselves and him both, and look to be esteemed accordingly."

Should it appear that on receipt of this communication, Francis was still resolved to persevere, and that he had other objects in view to which Henry had not been made privy, the ambassadors were then to remind him of the remaining obligations into which he had entered; and to ascertain to what degree his assistance might be calculated upon, should the pope pronounce Henry deposed, and the emperor attempt to enforce the sentence.

After forwarding these instructions, the king's next step was to anticipate the pope by an appeal which would neutralize his judgment should be venture upon it; and which offered a fresh opportunity of restoring the peace of Christendom, if there was true anxiety to preserve that peace. The hinge of the great question, in the form which at last it assumed, was the validity or invalidity of the dispensation by which Henry had married his brother's widow. Being a matter which touched the limit of the pope's power, the pope was himself unable to determine it in his own favour; and the only authority by which the law could be ruled, was a general council. The street tage of this In the preceding winter, the pope had volunteered to submit the question to this tribunal; but Henry believing that it was on the point of immediate solution in another way, had then declined, on the ground that it would cause a needless delay. He was already married, and he had hoped that sentence might be given in his favour in time to anticipate the publication of the ceremony. But he was perfectly satisfied that justice was on his side, and was equally confident of obtaining the verdict of Europe, if it could be fairly pronounced. Now, therefore, under the altered circumstances, he accepted the offered alternative. He anticipated with tolerable certainty the effect which would be produced at Rome, when the news should arrive there of the Dunstable divorce; and on the 29th of June he appealed formally, in the presence of the Archbishop of York, from the pope's impending sentence, to the next general coun- \mathbf{cil}^1

Of this curious document the substance was as follows: — It commenced with a declaration Terms of the hing bee that the king had no intention of acting the king bee at the king had no intention of acting the king bee at the king had no intention of acting the king bee at the king been a

I Of the Archbishop of York, not of Canterbury which provokes a question. Conjectures are of little value in history, but inasmuch as there must have been some grave reason for the substitution, a suggestion of a possible reason may not be wholly out of place. The appeal in itself was strictly legal; and it was of the highest importance to avoid any illegality of form. Craumer, by transgressing the inhibition which Clement had issued in the wister, might be construed by the papel party to be a virtually incurred the consures threatened, and an escape might thus have seen furnished from the difficulty in which the appeal placed them.

Holy See. If his words could be lawfully shown to have such a tendency, he would revoke, entend, and correct them in a Catholic spirit.

The general features of the case were then recapitulated. His marriage with his brother's wife But Burego he ving da-cared in his had been pronounced illegal by the principal Sevour in Ma universities of Europe, by the clergy of the west matter, two provinces of the Church of England, by epimation of the Most the most learned theologians and canonists, Fligh," be bes married another wife. and finally, by the public judgment of the church. He therefore had felt himself free; and, "by the inspiration of the Most High, had lawfully married another woman." Furthermore, " for the common weal and tranquillity of the realm of England, and for the wholesome rule and government of the same, he had caused to be enacted certain statutes and ordinances, by authority of parliaments lawfully called for He Services that purpose." " Now, however," he continthe pope, who has inued, " we fearing that his Holyness the Pope three ugh out, having in our said cause treated no may now mare of the far otherwise than either respect for our dignity and desert, or the duty of his own office aminet blue required at his hands, and having done us many injuries which we now of design do suppress, but which hereafter we shall be ready, should circumstances so require, to divulge may now proceed to acts of further injustice, and heaping wrong on wrong, may pronounce the censures and other penalties of the spiritual sword against ourselves, our realm, and subjects, seeking thereby to deprive us of the use of the sacraments, and to cut us off, in the sight of the world, from the unity of the church, to the no slight hurt and injury of our realm and subjects:

Publico ecclesim judicio.

"Fearing these things, and desiring to preserve from detriment not only ourselves, our own dignity and estimation, but also our subjects, committed to us by Almighty God; to keep them in the unity of the Christian faith, and in the wonted participation in the sacraments; that, when in truth they be not cut off from the integrity of the church, nor can nor will be so cut off in any manner, they may not appear to be so cut off in the estimation of men: [desiring further] to check and hold back our people whom God has given to us, lest, in the event of such injury, they refuse utterly to obey any longer the Roman Pontiff, as a hard and cruel pastor: [for these causes] and believing, from reasons probable, conjectures likely, and words used to our injury by his Holiness the Pope, which in divers manners have been brought to our ears, that some weighty act may be committed by him or others to the prejudice of ourselves and of our realm; - We, therefore, in behalf of all and He appeals every of our subjects, and of all persons ad- from any hering to us in this our cause, do make our sures to the appeal to the next general council, which shall be lawfully held, in place convenient, with the consent of the Christian princes, and of such others as it may concern — not in contempt of the Holy See, but for defence of the truth of the Gospel, and for the other causes afore rehearsed. And we do trust in God that it shall not be interpreted as a thing ill done on our part, if preferring the salvation of our soul and the relief of our conscience to any mundane respects or favours, we have in this cause regarded more the Divine law then the laws of man, and have thought it rather meet to obey God than to obey man." 1

1 Rymer, Vol. VI part 2, p. 184.

By the appeal and the causes which were assigned for it, Henry preoccupied the ground of the conflict; he entrenched himself in the "debateable land" of legal uncertainty; and until his position had been prononneed untenable by the general voice of Christendom, any sentence which the pope could issue would have but a doubtful validity. It was, perhaps, but a slight advantage; and the niceties of technical fencing might soon resolve themselves into a question of merc strength; yet, in the opening of great conflicts, it is well, even when a resort to force is inevitable, to throw on the opposing party the responsibility of violence; and Henry had been led, either by a refinement of policy, or by the plain straightforwardness of his intentions, into a situation where he could expect without alarm the unrolling of the future.

The character of that future was likely soon to be decided. The appeal was published on the 29th of June; and as the pope must have heard, by the middle of the month at latest, of the trial and judgment at Dunstable, a few days would bring an account of the manner in which he had received the intelligence. Prior to the arrival of the couriers, Bennet, with the assistance of Cardinal Tournon, had somewhat soothed down his exasperation. Francis, also, having heard that immediate process was threatened, had written earnestly to deprecate such a measure; ¹ and though he took the interference "very displeasantly," the pope could not afford to lose, by premature impatience, the fruit of all his labour and diplomacy, and had yielded so far as to promise that nothing of moment should be done. To this state of mind he had been brought one day in the second week of June. The morning after, Bennet found him " sore altered." The news the news of of "my Lord of Canterbury's proceedings" the divorces proceedings that arrived the preceding night; and "his arrive of Holiness said that [such] doings were too Roma sore for him to stand still at and do nothing." It was "against his duty towards God and the world to tolerate them." The imperialist cardinals, impatient before, clampured that the evil had been caused by the dilatory timidity with which the case had been handled from the first.* The consistory sate day after day with closed doors; 4 and even such members of it geometreas had before inclined to the English side, the country joined in the common indignation. * Some  extreme process" was instantly looked for, and the English agents, in their daily interviews with the pope, were forced to listen to larguage which it was hard to bear with equanimity. Bennet's well-bred courtesy carried him successfully through the difficulty; his companion Bonner was not so fortunate. Bonner's tongue was insolent, and under bad control. Bonne to He replied to menace by impertinence; and The tops threatens to one occasion was so exasperating, that but him in Clement threatened to burn him abve, or He without toil him in a caldron of lead. When fairly England. roused, the old man was dangerous; and the future

¹ The French king did write unto Cardinal Tourson (not, however, of his own will, but under pressure from the Duke of Norfolk), very materally, that he should desire the pope, in the said French king's name, that his Holygues would not inservate anything against your Highness any wise till the congress adding, withal, that if his Holyness, notwithstanding his said tesire, would proceed, he could not loss do considering the great and indiscention amity between your Highnesses, notorious to all the world, but take and recognise such proceeding for a fresh my my — Beanet to Henry VIII. 6006 Papers, Vol. VII p. 468

¹ State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 489 . 2 Ibid.

^{*} Told. p. 470. 1 Hild. p. 467, note, and p. 4 '

⁴ Burnet, Vol. I. p. 991.

Bishop of London wrote to England in extremity of alarm. His letter has not been found, but the character of it may be perceived from the reassuring reply of the king. The agents, Henry said, were not to allow themselves to be frightened; they were to go on calmly, with their accustomed diligence and dexterity, disputing the ground from point to point, and trust to him. Their cause was good, and, with God's help, he would be able to defend them from the malice of their adversaries.¹

Fortunately for Bonner, the pope's passion was of brief duration, and the experiment whether The cousinterry cooks Henry's arm could reach to the dungeons of into prothe Vatican remained untried. The more moderate of the cardinals, also, something assuaged the storm; and angry as they all were, the majority still saw the necessity of prudence. In the heat of the irritation, final sentence was to have been pronounced upon the entire cause, backed by interdict, excommunication, and the full volume of the papal thunders. At the close of a month's deliberation they resolved to reserve judgment on the original question, and to confine themselves for the present to revenging the insult to the pope by "my Lord of Canterbury." Both the king and the archbishop had disobeyed a formal inhibition. On the 12th of July, the pope issued a brief,

We only desire and pray you to undeavour yourselves in the execution of that your charge—casting atterly away and banishing from you such that and timorousness, or rather despair, as by your said letters we perceive yo have conceived—reducing to your memories in the lieu and stead thereof, as a thing continually lying before your yes and increasantly sounded in your ears, the justice of our cause, which cannot at length be shadowed, but shall share and shew itself to the confusion of our advertures. And we having, as is said, truth for us, with the help and assistance of God, author of the same, shall at all times be able to maintain you—Henry VIII to Konners State Papers, Vol. VII p. 485 declaring Cranmer's judgment to have been illegal, the English process to have been null and void, Job 12. and the king, by his disobedience, to have in- tiare the dicurred, ipso facto, the threatened ponulties of and ours. excommunication. Of his clemency he suspended these censures till the close of the fol- like him to lowing September, in order that time might sockers be allowed to restore the respective parties to mid.

mands Eleney

their old positions: if within that period the parties were not so restored, the censures would fall. This brief was sent into Flanders, and fixed in the usual place against the door of a church in Dunkirk.

Henry was prepared for a measure which was no more than natural. He had been prepared for it as a possibility when he married. Both he and Francis must have been prepared for it on their meeting at Calais, when the French king advised him to marry, and promised to support him through the consequences. His own measures had been arranged beforehand, and he had secured himself in technical entrenchments by his appeal. After the issue of the brief, however, he could allow no English embassy to compliment Clement by its presence on his visit to France. He "knew the pope," as he said. Long experience had shown him that nothing was to be gained by yielding in minor points; and the only chance which now remained of preserving the established order of Christendom, was to terrify the Vatican court into submission by the firmness of his attitude. For the present complications, the court of Rome, not he, was responsible. The pope, with a culpable complacency for the emperor, had shrunk from discharging a duty which his office imposed upon him; and the result had been that the duty was discharged by another. Henry could not blame himself for the consequences of Clemant's delinquency. He rather felt himself wronged in having been driven to so extreme a measure against themy again his will. He resolved, therefore, to recal the embassy, and once more, though with no great hope that he would be successful, to make the great hope that he would be successful, to make the great hope that he would be successful, to make the francis to fulfil his promise, and to unite with himself in expressing his resentment at the pope's conduct.

3 Benner to Cromwell. State Capera, Vol. VII p. 481

His despatch to the Duke of Norfolk on this occasion. was the natural sequel of what he had writ-August B. ten a few weeks previously. That letter had failed wholly of its effect. The interview was resolved upon for quite other reasons than those which were acknowledged, and therefore was not to be given up. A promise, however, had been extracted, that it should be given up, if in the course of the summer the pope "innovated anything" against the King of England; and Henry now required, formally, that this engagement should be observed. "A notorious and notable innovation" had been made, and Francis must either deny his words, or adhere to them. It would be evident to all the world, if the interview took place under the present circumstances, that the alliance with Engand was no longer of the importance with him which it had been; that his place in the struggle, when the struggle came, would be found on the papal side.

The language of Henry throughout this paper was the course at very fine and noble. He reminded Francis that substantially the cause at issue was the cause of all princes; the pope claiming a right to summen them to plead in the courts of Rome, and refusing to admit their exemption as sovereign rulers.

He had been required not only to undo his marriage, and cancel the sentence of divorce, but, as a Beau too required to repeat the Act of Apto undo also the Act of Appeals, and to restore the papal jurisdiction. He desired it to be understood, with emphasis, that these points were all equal y sacred, and the repeal of the act was as little which is to be thought of as the annulling the marriage. "The pope," he said, "did inforce us to excogitate some new thing, whereby we might be healed and relieved of that continual disease, to care for our cause at Rome, where such defence was taken from us, as by the laws of God, nature, and man, is due unto us. Hereupon depended the wealth of our realm; hereupon consisted the surety of our succession, which by no other means could be well assured." " And therefore," he went on, "you [the Duke] shall He, thereing in the ways he hath entered, ye must have not needs despair in any meeting between the "" French king and the pope, to produce any such effect as to cause us to meet in concord with the pope; but we shall be even as far asunder as is between yea and nay. For to the pope's enterprise to revoke or put back anything that is done here, either in marriage, statute, sentence, or proclamation 1 — of which four members is knit and conjoined the surety of our matter, nor any can be removed from the other, lest thereby the whole edificashould be destroyed — we will and shall, by all ways and means say nay, and declare our nay in such sort as the world shall hear, and the pope feel it. Wherein te may say our firm trust, perfect hope, and assured confidence is, that our good brother will agree with us: as well for that it should be partly dishon-And be trusts that ourable for him to see decay the thing that Francis wills agree with was of his own foundation and planting; as the popula also that it should be too much dishonoural le for us - having travelled so far in this matter, and brought it to this point, that all the storms of the year passed, it is now come to harvest, trusting to see shortly the fruit of our marriage, to the wealth, joy, and comfort of all our realm, and our own singular consolation - that anything should now be done by us to impair the same, and to put our issue either in peril of bastardy, or otherwise disturb that [which] is by the whole agreement of our realm established for their and our commodity, wealth, and benefit. And in this determination ye know us to be so fixed, and the contrary hereof to be so infeasible, either at our hands, or by the consent of the realm, that ye must needs despair of any order to be taken by the French king with the pope. For if any were by him taken wherein any of these four pieces should be touched - that is that he can princt to say, the marriage of the queen our wife, the revocation of the Bishop of Canterbury's sentence, the statute of our realm, or our late proclamstion, which be as it were one — and as walls, covering, and foundation make a house, so they knit together, establish, and make one matter --- ye be well assured, and be so ascertained from us, that in no wise we will relent, but will, as we have before written, withstand the same. Whereof ye may say that ye have thought good to advertise him, to the intent he make no farther promise to the pope therein than may be performed."

The proclamation ordering that Outherine should be called not queen, at Princets Downger.

The ambassadors were the more emphatically to insist on the king's resolution, lest Francis, in his desire for conciliation, might hold out hopes to the pope which could not be realized. They were to say, however, that the King of England still trusted that the interview would not take place. The see of Rome was asserting a jurisdiction which, if conceded, would encourage an unlimited usurpation. If princes might be cited to the papal courts in a cause of matrimony, they might be cited equally in other causes at the pope's pleasure; and the free kingdoms of Europe would be converted into dependent provinces of the see of Rome. It concerned alike the interest and the honour of all sovereigns to resist encroachments which pointed to such an issue; and, therefore, Henry said he And the pope hoped that his good brother would use the made in unpope as he had deserved, "doing him to buy. understand his folly, and [that] unless he had first made amends, he could not find in his heart to have further amity with him."

If notwithstanding, the instructions concluded, "all those persuasions cannot have place to let the said meeting, and the French king shall say it is expedient for him to have in his hands the duchess," under pretence of marriage for his son, which he cannot obtain but by this means, ye shall say that ye remember ye heard him say once he would never conclude that marriage but to do us good, which is now infaisible; and now in the voice of the world shall do us both more hurt in the diminution of the reputation of our amity than it should do otherwise profit. Neverthe—

[17] And the amount in this shall your lines branch the said to prove the profit of the two inconvenients, it is to you have the return have a the said.

· Catherine de Medici.

more telerable to return to us nothing done, than to be present at the interview and to be compelled to look patiently upon your master's enemy."

After having entered thus their protest against the French king's conduct, the embassy was to return to England, leaving a parting intimation of the single condition under which Henry would consent to treat. the pope would declare that " the matrimony with the Lady Catherine was and is nought, he should do somewhat not to be refused;" except with this preliminary, no offer whatever could be entertained.1

This communication, as Henry anticipated, was not more effectual than the former in respect of trans the its immediate object. At the meeting of Calais the interests of Francis had united him with England, and in pursuing the objects of Henry he was then pursuing his own. The pope and the emperor had dissolved the coalition by concessions on the least dangerous side. The interests of Francis lay now in the other direction, and there are few instances in history in which governments have adhered to obligations against their advantage from a spirit of honour, when the purposes with which they contracted those obligations have been otherwise obtained. The English embassy returned as they were ordered; the French court pursued their way to Marseilles; not quarrelling with England; intending to abide by the alliance, and to give all proofs of amity which did not involve inconvenient sacrifices; but producing on the world at large by their conduct the precise effect which Henry had foretold. The world at large, looking at acts rather than to words, regarded the interview as a contrivance to reconcile Francis and the emperor through the intervention of the pope, as a proliminary for a packed council, and for a holy remaind Catholic bit unviolated the Pope, the Catholic bit unviolated to of ominous augury to Christendom, from the Emperor, and the Ring consequences of which, if Germany was to of France be the first sufferer, England would be inevitably the second.

Henry VIII. to the Duke of Norfolk: State Papers, Yol. VII. p. 493.

Meanwhile, as the French alliance threatened to fail, the English government found themselves driven at last to look for a connexion among those powers from whom they had hitherto most anxiously disconnected themselves. At such a time Protestant Ger many, not Catholic France, was England's Boptember 4. natural friend. The Reformation was essentially a Teutonic movement; the Germans, towards Ger the English, the Scotch, the Swedes, the many-Hollanders, all were struggling on their various roads towards an end essentially the same. The same dangers threatened them, the same inspiration moved them; and in the eyes of the orthodox Catholics they were united in a black communion of heresy. Unhappily, though this identity was obvious to their enemies, it was far from obvious to themselves. The odium theologicum is ever hotter between sections of the same party which are divided by want of trifling differences, than between the open Protestants.

I fir John Hecket, writing from Chent on the 5th of September, describes in the general impression that the Popo's "trust was to assure his alliance on both sides." "He trusts to bring about that his Majerty the French king and be shall become and remain in good, first, and sure alliance together; and so ensuring that they three (the Pope, Francis, and Charles V) shall be able to reform and set good order in the rest of Christendom. But whether his Unhappiness's —I mean his Holmess's —intention, is set for the welfare and util ty of Christendom, or for his own insincentry and singular purpose, I remit that to God and to them that know more of the world than I do." — Hacket to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol VII. p. 506.

YOL IL

representatives of antagonist principles; and Anglicans and Lutherans, instead of joining hands across the Channel, endeavoured only to secure each a recognition of themselves at the expense of the other. English plumed themselves on their orthodoxy. They were "not as those publicans," heretics, despisers of the keys disobedient to authority; they desired only the independence of their national church, and they proved their zeal for the established faith with all the warmth of persecution. To the Germans national freedom was of wholly minor moment, in comparison with the freedom of the soul; the orthodoxy of England was as distasteful to the disciples of Luther as the orthodoxy of Rome — and the interests of Europe were sacrificed on both aides to this foolish and fatal disunion. Circumstances indeed would not permit the division to remain in its first intensity, and their common danger compelled the two nations into a partial understanding. Yet the reconciliation, imperfect to the last, was at the outset all but impossible. Their relations were already embittered by many reciprocal acts of hostility. Henry VIII. had won his spurs as a theologian by an attack on Luther. Luther had replied by a hailstorm of invectives. The Lutheran books had been proscribed, the Lutherans themselves had been burnt by Henry's bishops. The Protestant divines in Germany had attempted to conciliate the emperor by supporting the cause of Catherine; and Luther himself had spoken loudly in condemnation of the king. The elements of disunion were so many and so powerful, that there was little hope of contending against them successfully. Nevertheless, as Henry saw, the coalition of Francis and the emperor, if the pope succeeded in cementing it, was a most serious danger, to which an opposite alliance would alone be an adequate counterpoise; and the experiment might at least be tried whether such an alliance was possible. At the beginning of August, therefore, Ste- Maton of phen Vaughan was sent on a tentative mis- Taughan to sion to the Elector of Saxe, John Frederick, the Court of the Elector at Weimar. He was the bearer of letters of beare, containing a proposal for a resident English ambassador; and if the elector gave his consent, he was to proceed with similar offers to the courts of the Landgrave of Hesse and the Duke of Lanenberg.* Vaughan arrived in due time at the elector's court, was admitted to audience, and delivered his letters. The prince read them, and in the evening of the same day returned for answer a polite but wholly absolute refusal. Being but a prince elector, he said, he might not aspire to so high an honour as to be favoured. with the presence of an English ambassador. It was not the custom in Germany, and he feared that if he consented be should displease the emperor.* The meaning of such a reply delivered in a few hours was not to be mistaken, however disguised in courteous language. The English emissary saw that he was an unwelcome visitor, and that he must depart with the utmost celerity. "The elector," he wrote, had no and "thirsted to have me gone from him, which I sty to compeon he him-right well perceived by evident tokens which imports."

I John the Magnanimous, son of John the Stradfiet, and neghter of the Elector Producick, Luther's first protector.

Blate Papers, Vol. VII. pp. 499-501.

^{*} Princeps Elector ducit se imparem at Regio Calaltadinis valuliarus regum erateres că lege in sulă suă degarent; vereturque ne ch id spus Casateans majoriatem uniours ajus Dominum et alice male audiret, pesset que simutre tale institutum interpretari. — Reply of the Elector State Pagers, Vol. VII. p. 503.

Vanghan to Cromwell: Sexie P mera, Vol. VII. p. 509 declared unto me the same." He had no anxiety to expose to hazard the toleration which the Protestant dukedoms as yet enjoyed from the emperor, by committing himself to a connexion with a prince with whose present policy he had no sympathy, and whose conversion to the cause of the Reformation he had as yet no reason to believe sincere.

The reception which Vaughan met with at Weimar satisfied him that he need go no further; neither the Landgrave nor the Duke of Lunenberg would be likely to venture on a course which the elector so obviously feared. He, therefore, gave up his mission, and returned to England.

The first overtures in this direction issued in com
the Alberta plete failure, nor was the result wholly to be regretted. It taught Henry (or it was a first commencement of the lesson) that so long as be pursued a merely English policy he might not expect that other nations would embroil themselves in his lefence. He must allow the Reformation a wider cope, he must permit it to comprehend within its possible consequences the breaking of the chains by which his subjects' minds were bound — not merely a change of jailors. Then perhaps the German princes might return some other answer.

Hense and the Duke of Lunenberg—to be the chief and principal defendum and maintainers of the Lutheran sect: who considering the same with no small difficulty to be defended, as well against the emperor and the Mahope of Germany, his eigh and shrewd neighbours, as against the most opinion of all Christian men, foureth to raise any other new matter whereby they should take a larger and peradventure a better occasion to revenge the same. The King's digituess seeketh to have intelligence with them, as they conjecture to have them confederate with him; yea, and that against the emperor, if he would anything pretend against the king.— Here in the thing which I think feareth the duke —Vaughan to Cromwell Mote Papers, Vol. VII pp. 509, 510.

The disappointment, however, fell lightly; for before the account of the failure had reached England, an event had happened, which, poor as the king might be in foreign alliances, had added most material strength to his position in England. The full moment of that event he had no means of knowing. In its immediate bearing it was matter for most abundant satisfaction. On the seventh of September, between three Supermoor 7 and four in the afternoon, at the palace of Proposes Greenwich, was born a princess, named three Limbeth. days later in her baptism, after the king's mother, Elizabeth. A son had been hoped for. The child was a daughter only; yet at least Providence had not pronounced against the marriage by a sentence of barrenness; at least there was now an heir whose legitimacy the nation had agreed to accept. Te Deums guiltates were sung in all the churches; again the river in Lordon. decked itself in splendour; again all London steeples were musical with bells. A font of gold was presented for the christening. Francis, in compensation for his backslidings, had consented to be godfather; and the infant, who was soon to find her country so rude a stepmother, was received with all the outward signs of exulting welcome. To Catherine's friends Light and the offspring of the rival marriage was not shadow welcome, but was an object rather of bitter hatred; and the black cloud of a sister's jealousy gathered over the cradle whose innocent occupant had robbed her of her title and her expectations. To the king, to the parliament, to the healthy heart of England, she was an object of eager hope and an occasion for thankful gratitude; but the seeds were sown with her birth of those minfortunes which were soon to overshadow her and to form the school of the great nature which in its maturity would re-mould the world.

4 Hall, p. 805.

Leaving Elizabeth for the present, we return to the continent, and to the long-promised interview, which was now at last approaching. Henry made no further attempt to remonstrate with Francis; and Francis assured him, and with all sincerity, that he would use his best efforts to move the pope to make the neces-The English embassy meanwhile lary concessions. The excommunication had been rewas withdrawn. ceived as an act of hostility, of which Henry would not even condescend to complain; and it was to be understood distinctly that in any exertions which might be made by the French king, the latter was acting without commission on his own responsibility. The in-Propagations tercession was to be the spontaneous act of a ter the tatus mutual friend, who, for the interests of Christendom, desired to heal a dangerous wound: but neither directly nor indirectly was it to be interpreted as an expression of a desire for a reconciliation on the English side.

It was determined further, on the recal of the Duke of Norfolk, that the opportunity of the meeting should be taken to give a notice to the pope of the king's appeal to the council; and for this purpose, Bennet and Bonner were directed to follow the papal court from Rome. Bennet never accomplished this journey, dying on the route, worn out with much service. His death delayed Bonner, and the conferences had opened for many days before his arrival. Clement had reached Marseilles by ship from Genoa, about the 20th of October. As if pointedly to irritate Henry, he had placed himself under the conduct of the Duke of

¹ State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 529.

Albany. He was followed two days later by his fair niece, Catherine do Medici; and the preparations for the marriage were commenced with the conduct the utmost swiftness and secrecy. The con- of the Dok ditions of the contract were not allowed to transpire, but they were concluded in three days; and on the 25th of October the pope bestowed his precious Oct 2006. performing the nuptial ceremony, and accompanying it with his paternal benediction on the books. young pair, and on the happy country which was to possees them for its king and queen. France being thus securely riveted to Rome, other matters could be talked of more easily. Francis made all decent overtures to the pope in behalf of Henry; if the pope was to be believed indeed, he was vehemently urgent. Clement in turn made suggestions for terms of alliance between Francis and Charles, " to the advantage of the Most Christian king; " and thus parried the remonstrances. The only point positively clear to the ob- Ambrado servers, was the perfect understanding which between the sxisted between the King of France and his Practice spiritual father.4 Unusual activity was re-

The Duke of Albany, during the minority of James V., had headed the party in Scotland most opposed to the English. He expelled the queen-mother, Margaret, nater of Hunry; he seized the persons of the two young princes, whom he shut up in Surling, where the younger brother died under suspicion of foul play { Desputches of Ginetinions, Vol. 1, p. 167); and subsequently, in his genius for intrigue, he gained over the queen downger herself in a manner which touched her homour — Lard Thomas Dacre to Queen Margaretz Ellis, second series, Vol. 1, p. 279.

[•] Ex his terress, qui he e a Pontifice, audierunt, intelligo regem vehemen. Histime instare, at vestra majortatic expectationi estimat Pontific. — Puter Vennes to Henry VIII.: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 518.

Hente Popere, Vol. VII. p. 590.

⁴ Hoe dies qued vides inter region et pontificem essignacilesime et amiphalme ble agi. — Vannes to Crous ell. Rid.

marked in the dockyards; Italian soldiers of fortune were about the court in unusual numbers, and apparently in favour. An invasion of Lombardy was talked of among the palace retinue; and the emperor was said to distrust the intentions of the conference. Possibly experience had taught all parties to doult each other's faith. Possibly they were all in some degree waiting upon events; and had not yet resolved upon their conduct.

In the midst of this scene arrived Doctor Bonner. in the beginning of November, with Henry's appeal. He was a strange figure to appear in such a society. There was little probity, perhaps, either in the court of France, or in their Italian visitors: but of refinement, of culture, of those graces which enable men to dispense with the more austere excellences of character. — which transform licentiousness into elegant frailty, and treachery and falsehood into pardonable finesse, - of these there was very much: and when a rough, coarse, vulgar Englishman was plunged among these delicate ladies and gentlemen, he formed an element which contrasted strongly with the general environment. Yet Bonner, perhaps, was not without qualifications which fitted him for his Character of mission. He was not, indeed, virtuous; but he had a certain downright honesty about him, joined with an entire insensibility to those finer perceptions which would have interfered with plain speaking, where plain speaking was desirable; he had a broad, not ungenial humour, which showed him things and persons in their genuine light, and enabled him to picture them for us with a distinctness for which we owe him lasting thanks.

¹ Vannes to Cromwalls State Papers, Vol. VII pp. 529-1.

He appeared at Marseilles on the 7th of November, and had much difficulty in procuring an interview. At length, weary of waiting, and regardless of the hot lead with which he had been lately threatened, he forced his way into the room where "the pope was standing, with the Cardinals De Lorraine and Medics, ready apparelled with his stole to ge to the consistory."

" Incontinently upon my coming thither," he wrote to Henry, 1 " the pope, whose sight is incredu- Bonson's belous quick, eyed me, and that divers times; kine making a good pause in one place; at which time I desired the datary to advertise his Holiness that I would speak with him; and albeit the datary made no little difficulty therein, yet perceiving that upon refusal I would have gone forthwith to the pope, he advertised the pope of my mid desire. His Holiness dismissing as then the said cardinals, and letting his vesture fall, went to a window in the said chamber, calling me At which time I showed unto his Holmess how that your Highness had given me express and strait commandment to intimate unto him how that your Grace had solemnly provoked and appealed unto the general council; submitting yourself to the tuition and defence thereof; which provocation and appeal I had under authentic writings then with me, to show for that purpose. And herewithal I drew out the said writing, showing his said Holiness that I brought the same in proof of the premises, and that his Holiness might see and perceive all the same. The pope having this for a breakfast, only pulled down his head to his shoulders, after the Italian fashion, and said that because he was as then fully ready to go into the consistory he would not tarry to hear or see the said writings, but willed me to come at afternoon."

¹ Burnet, Collectmen, p. 434.

The afternoon came, and Bonner returned, and was admitted. There was some conversation appear in deferent matters; the pope making the pope.

The ting!

good-natured inquiries about Bennet, and speaking warmly and kindly of him.

" Presently," Bonner continues, " falling out of that, he said that he marvelled your Highness would use his Holiness after such sort as it appears we did. I said that your Highness no less did marvel that his Holiness having found so much benevolence and kindness at your hands in all times past, would for acquittal show such unkindness as of late he did. And here we entered in communication upon two points: one was that his Holiness, having committed in times past, and in most ample form, the cause into the realm, promising not to revoke the said commission, and over that, to confirm the process and sentence of the commissaries. should not at the point of sentence have advoked the cause, retaining it at Rome - forasmuch as Rome was a place whither your Highness could not, ne yet ought, personally to come unto, and also was not bound to send thither your proctor. The second point was, that your Highness's cause being, in the opinion of the best learned men in Christendom, approved good and just, and so [in] many ways known unto his Holiness, the same should not so long have retained it in his hands without judgment.

"His Holiness answering the same, as touching the first point, said that if the queen (meaning the late wife of Prince Arthur, calling her always in his conversation the queen) had not given an oath refusing the judges as suspect, he would not have advoked the mat-determined and ended in your realm. But seeing she gave that oath, appealing also to his court, he might and ought to hear her, his promise made to your Highness, which was qualified, notwithstanding. As touching the second point, his Holiness said that your Highness only was the default thereof, because ye would not send a proxy to the cause. These matters, however, he said, had been many times fully talked upon at Rome; and therefore [he] willed me to omit further communication thereupon, and to proceed to the doing of such things that I was specially sent for.

Whereupon making protestation of your Highness's mind and intent towards the see apostolic -- not intending anything to do in contempt of the same — I exhibited unto his Holiness the commission which your Highness had sent unto me; and his Holiness delivering it to the datary, commanded him to read it; and hearing in the same the words (referring to the injuries which he had done to your Highness), he began to look up after a new sort, and said, 'O questo et multo vero! (this is much true!)' meaning that it was not true indeed. And verily, sure not only in this, but also in many parts of the said commission, he showed himself grievously offended; insomuch that, when those words, 'To the next general council which shall be lawfully held in place convenient," were read, he fell in a marvellous great choler and rage, The popula not only declaring the same by his gesture week and manner, but also by words: speaking with great webemence, and saying, 'Why did not the king, when I wrote to my nuncio this year past, to speak unto him for this general council, give no answer unto my said nuncia, but referred him for answer to the French king? at what time he might perceive by my doing, that I was very well disposed, and much spake for it.' The thing so standing, now to speak of a general council I. On, good Lord! but well I his commission and all his other writings cannot be but welcome unto me; 'which words methought he spake willing to hide his choler, and make me believe that he was nothing angry with their doings, when in very deed I perceived, by many arguments, that it was otherwise. And one among others was taken here for infallible with them that knoweth the pope's conditions, that he was continually folding up and unwinding of his handkerchief, which he never doth but when he is tickled to the very heart with great choler."

. At length the appeal was read through; and at the close of it Francis entered, and talked to the pope for some time, but in so low a voice that Bonner could not hear what was passing. When he had gone, his Holiness said that he would deliberate upon the appeal with the consistory, and after hearing their judgments would return his answer.

Three days passed, and then the English agent was informed that he might again present himself. The pope had recovered his calmness. When he had time to collect himself, Clement could speak well and with dignity; and if we could forget that his conduct was substantially unjust, and that in his conscience he knew it to be unjust, he would almost persuade us to believe him honest. "He said," wrote Bonner, "that his mind towards your Highness always had been to minister justice, and to do pleasure to you; albeit it hath not been so taken: and he never unjustly grieved your Grace that he knoweth, nor intendeth hereafter to do. As concerning the appeal, he said that, forasmuch as there was a constitution of Pope Pius, his predecessor, that did condemn and reprove all such appeals, he did therefore reject your Grace's appeal as frivThe appeal clous, forbidden, and unlawful." As touching the council, he said generally, that he would do his best that it should meet; but it was to be understood that the calling a general council belonged to him, and not to the King of England.

The audience ended, and Bonner left the pope convinced that he intended, on his return to Rome, to execute the censures and continue the process without delay. That the sentence which he would pronounce would be against the king appeared equally certain.

It appeared certain, yet after all no certain conclusion is possible. Francis I., though not choos- Tet an Boning to quarrel with the see of Rome to do a ner's departpleasure to Henry, was anxious to please his Tourish that ally to the extent of his convenience; at any Boginsd's rate, he would not have gratuitously deceived was byes, him; and still less would be have been party to an act of deliberate treachery. When Bonner was gone he had a last interview with the pope, in which he urged upon him the necessity of complying with Henry's demands; and the pope on this occasion said And Who that he was satisfied that the King of England will only acknowledge was right; that his cause was good; and that the Papal he had only to acknowledge the papal jurisdiction by some formal act, to find sentence his avear immediately pronounced in his favour. Except for his precipitation, and his refusal to depute a proxy to plead for him, his wishes would have been complied with long before. In the existing posture of affairs, and after the measures which had been passed in England with respect to the see of Rome, he himself, the pope mil, could not make advances without some kind of rebmission; but a single act of acknowledgment was all which he required.

Extraordinary as it must seem, the pope certainly wastepope bound himself by this engagement: and who beneat? or tell with what intention? To believe him sincere and to believe him false seems equally impossible. If he was persuaded that Henry's cause was good, why did he in the following year pronounce finally for Catherine? why had he imperilled so needlessly the interests of the papacy in England? why had his conduct from the beginning pointed steadily to the conclusion at which he at last arrived? and why throughout Europe were the ultramontane party, to a man, on Catherine's side? On the other hand, Let us to 7 to what object at such a time can be conceived. for falsehood? Can we suppose that he designed to dupe Henry into submission by a promise which be had predetermined to break? It is hard to suppose even Clement capable of so elaborate an act of perfidy; and it is, perhaps, idle to waste conjectures on the motives of a weak, much-agitated man. He was, probably, but giving a fresh example of his disposition to say at each moment whatever would be most agreeable to his hearers. This was his unhappy habit, by which he earned for himself a character for dishenesty. I labour to think, but half deserved.

If, however, Clement meant to deceive, he succeeded, trapped undoubtedly, in deceiving the French king.

Francis, in communicating to Henry the lander to a communicating to Henry the lander to a communicating to the state of t

Letter of the King of France: Lagrand, Yel. III. Reply of Henry: Form. Yel. V > 130

the pope would meet him in a middle course. Judges sould be appointed, who should sit at Cambray, and pass a sentence in condemnation of the original marriage; with a definite promise that their sentence should not again be called in question. To this arrangement there could be no reasonable objection; and Francis implored that a proposal so liberal should not be rejected. Sufficient danger already threatened Christendom, from heretics within and from the Turks without; and although the English parliament were agreed to maintain the second marriage, it was unwise to provoke the displeasure of foreign princes. To allow time for the preliminary arrangements, the execution of the censures had been further postponed; and if Henry would make up the quarrel, the French monarch was commissioned to offer a league, offensive and defensive, between England, France, and the Papacy. He himself only desired to be faithful to his engagements to his good brother; and as a Francis inproof of his good faith, he said that he had to coment been offered the Duchy of Milan, if he would look on while the emperor and the pope attacked England.1

This language bears all the character of sincerity, and when we remember that it followed immediately upon a close and intimate communication of three weeks with Clement, it is not easy to believe that he could have mistaken the extent of the pope's promises. We may suppose Clement for the moment to have been honest, or wavering between honesty and falsehood; we may suppose further that Francis trusted him because it was undesirable to be suspicious, in the behet that he was discharging the duty of a friend to Henry and of a friend to the church, in offering to mediate upon these terms.

² Commission of the Bishop of Paris Legrand, Vol. III., Bernet, Vol. III. p. 123; Foxe, Vol. V. p. 106-111. The commission of the Bishop of Bayonne is not explicit on the extent to which the pope had bound Almself with respect to the sentence. Yet either in some other despetch, or verbally through the Bishop, Francis certainly informed Hanry that the Pope had promised that sentence about the given in his favour. We shall find Hanry assuming this in his reply; and the Archbishop of Tork declared to Catherine that the pope "said at Marse-illes, that if his Grace would send a proxy thither he would give sentence for his Highness against her, because that he know his cause to be good and just "— State Papers, Vol. I.

But Henry was far advanced beyond the point at which fair words could move him. He had trusted many times, and had been many times deceived. It was not easy to entangle him again. It mattered little whether Clement was weak or false; the result was the same — he could not be trusted. To an open English understanding there was something monstrous in the position of a person professing to be a judge, who admitted that a cause which lay before him was so clear that he could bind himself to a sentence upon it, and could yet refuse to pronouncethat sentence, except upon conditions. It was scarcely for the interests of justice to leave the distribution of it in hands so questionable.

Instead, therefore, of coming forward, as Francis hoped, instead of consenting to entangle himself again in the meshes of diplomatic intrigue, the king returned a peremptory refusal.

The Duke of Norfolk, and such of the council as treaded the completion of the schism, assured d'Inteville, the French ambassador, that for themselves they considered Francis was doing the best for England which could be done, and that they deprecated violent measures as much as possible; but in all this party there was a secret leaning to Queen Catherine, a dislike of Queen Anne and the whole Boleyn race, and 5 private nope and belief that the pope would after all be firm. Their tongues were therefore tied. They durst not speak except alone in whispers to each other, and the French ambassador, who did dare, only drew from Henry a more determined expression of his resolution.

As to his measures in England, the king said, the pope had begun the quarrel by issuing censures and by refusing to admit his reasons for declining to plead at Rome. He was required to send a proctor, and was told that the cause should be decided in favour of whichever party was so represented there. For the take of all other princes as well as himself, he would send no proctor, nor would be seem to acquiesce in the pretences of the papal see. The King of France told him that the pope admitted the justice of his cause. Let the pope do justice, then. The laws passed in parliament were for the benefit of the commonwealth, and he would never revoke them. He demanded no reparation, and could make no reparation. only for his right, and if he could not obtain it, he had God and truth on his side, and that was enough. In vain d'Inteville answered feebly, that his master had done all that was in his power; the king replied that the French council wished to entangle him with the pope; but for his own part he would never more acknowledge the pope in his pretended capacity. He might be bishop of Rome, or pope also, if he preferred the name; but the see of Rome should have no more jurisdiction in England, and he thought he would be none the worse Christian on that account, but rather the better. Jesus Christ he would acknowledge, and him only, as the true Lord of Christian men, and Christ's word only should be preached in England. YOL IL 11

Google

The Spaniards might invade him as they threatened. He did not fear them. They might come, but they might not find it so easy to return.1

The King had taken his position and was prepared for the consequences. He had foreseen for more than a year the possibility of an attempted invasion; and since his marriage, he had been aware that the chances of success in the adventure had been discussed on the Continent by the papal and imperal party. The pope had spoken of his censures being enforced, and Francis had revealed to Henry the nature of the dangerous overtures which had been made to himself. The Lutherap princes had hurriedly declined to connect them selves in any kind of alliance with England; and on the 25th of September, Stephen Vaughan had reported that troops were being raised in Germany, which rumour destined for Catherine's service.3 Ireland, too, as we shall hear in the next chapter, was on the vergeof an insurrection, which had been fomented by papal agents.

Nevertheless, there was no real danger from an invasion, unless it was accompanied with an The coud-Hope ender insurrection at home, or with a simultaneous which interion might attack from Scotland; and while of the first be dangerthere appeared upon the surface no probability, with Scotland a truce for a year had been concluded on the 1st of October.3 The king, therefore, had felt himself reasonably secure. Parlia-Apparent trainquility ment had seemed unanimous; the clergy

Rymer, Vol. VI part 2, p. 189.

² MS. Bibl. Impér. Paris. — The Pilgrim, pp. 97, 98. Cé. Foxe, Vol. V. p. 110.

I hear of a number of Gelders which be lately reared; and the opinion of the people here is that they shall go into England. All mon there speak twil of England, and threaten it in their feelish manner. Vaughan to Oremwell: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 511.

were aubmissive; the nation acquiescent or openly approving: 1 and as late as the beginning of November. 1533, no suspicion seems to have been entertained of the spread of serious disaffection. A great internal revolution had been accomplished: a conflict of centuriss between the civil and spiritual powers had been terminated without a life lost or a blow struck. Partial murmurs there had been, but murmurs were inevitable, and, so far as the government yet knew, were harmless. The Scotch war had threatened to be dangerous, but it had been extinguished. Impatient monks had denounced the king from the pulpits, and disloyal language had been reported from other quarters, which had roused vigilance, but had not created alarm. The Nun of Kent had forced herself into the royal presonce with menacing prophecies; but she had appeared to be a harmless dreamer, who could only be made of importance by punishment. The surface of the nation was in profound repose. Cromwell, like Walsingham after him, may perhaps have known of the fire which was smouldering below, and have watched it silently till the moment came at which to trample it out; but no symptom of unessiness appears either in the conduct of the government or in the official correspondence. The organization of the friars, the secret communication of the Nun with Catherine and the Princess Mary, with the papal nuncio, or with noble lords Parties were to divided in England that lookers on who reported my the sentiment in general there, reported in fact by their own wishes and sympathies. D'inteville, the French ambassador, a strong Catholic, declares the feeling to have been against the revolt. Chastillon, on the other hand, writing at the same time from the name place (for he had returned from France, and was present with d'Inteville at the last interview), says. The fing has made up his mind to a complete separation from Rome and the terds and the majority of the people go along with him." — Chastillon to the Rishop of Paris: The Pilgrein, p. 98.

and reverend bishops, was either unknown, or the character of those communications was not suspected.

That a serious political conspiracy should have kind considered. Shaped itself round the ravings of a seeming lunatic, to all appearance had not occurred as a possibility to a single member of the council, except to those whose shence was ensured by their complicity.

So far as we are able to trace the story (for the reserve to the discovery of the designs which were entertained, are something imperfect), the suspicions of the government were first roused in the following manner:

Queen Catherine, as we have already seen, had been called upon, at the coronation of Anne Boleyn, to renounce her title, and she had refused. Mary had been similarly deprived of her rank as prancess; but either her disgrace was held to be involved in that of her mother, or some other cause, perhaps the absence of immediate necessity, had postponed the demand for her own personal submission. As, however, on the publication of the second marriage, it had been urged on Catherine that there could not be two queens in On the both England, so on the both of the Princess Elizof Emboth, an analogous argument required the milia upon disinheritance of Mary. It was a hard thing; but her mother's conduct obliged the king to be peremptory. She might have been legitimatized by act of parliament, if Catherine would have submitted. The consequences of Catherine's refusal might be cruel, but they were unavoidable.

Mary was not with her mother. It had been held desirable to remove her from an influence which would encourage her in a useless opposition; and she was residing at Beaulieu, afterwards New Hall, in Essex, under the care of Lord Hussey and the Countess of Salisbury. Lord Hussey was a dangerous guardian, he was subsequently executed for his complicity in the Pilgrimage of Grace, the avowed object of which was the restoration of Mary to her place as heir-apparent. We may believe, therefore, that while under his surruillance she experienced no severe restraint, nor reseived that advice with respect to her conduct which prudence would have dictated. Lord Hussey, however, for the present enjoyed the confidence of the king, and was directed to inform his charge, that for the future she was to consider herself not as princess, but as the king's natural daughter, the Lady Mary Tudor. message was a painful one; painful, we will hope, more on her mother's account than on her own; but her answor implied that, as yet, Henry VIII. was no object of especial terror to his children.

"Her Grace replied," wrote Lord Hussey to the council in communicating the result of his the replication undertaking,1 that "she could not a little metrobally. marvel that I being alone, and not associate with some other the king's most honourable council, nor yet sufficiently authorized neither by commission nor by any other writing from the King's Highness, would attempt to declare such a high enterprise and matter of no little weight and importance unto her Grace, in diminishing her said estate and name; her Grace not doubting that she is the king's true and legitimate daughter and seir procreate in good and lawful matrimony; [and] further adding, that unless she were advertised from his Highness by his writing that his Grace was so minded to diminish her estate, name, and lignity, which she trustwith his Highness will never do, she would not believe it."

1 Strype, Eccies. Memor., Vol. 1 p. 254.

Insanuch as Mary was but sixteen at this time, the resolution which she displayed in sending such a measure was considerable. The early English held almost Roman notions on the asture of parental authority, and the tone of a child to a father was usually that of the most submissive reverence. Nor was she contented with replying indirectly through her guardian. She the thing is a most submissive wrote herself to the king, saying that she that these neither could nor would in her conscience think the contrary, but that she was his lawful daughter born in true matrimony, and that she thought that he in his own conscience did judge the same.

Such an attitude in so young a girl was singular, yet not necessarily consurable. Henry was not her only parent, and if we suppose her to have been actuated by affection for her mother, her conduct may appear not pardonable only, but spirited and creditable. insisting upon her legitimacy, nevertheless, she was not only asserting the good name and fame of Catherine of Arragon, but unhappily her own class to the succession to the throne. It was natural that under the circumstances she should have felt her right to assert that claim; for the injury which she had suffered was patent not only to herself, but to Europe. Catherine might have been required to give way that the king might have a son, and that the succession might be established in a prince; but so long as the child of the second marriage was a daughter only, it seemed substantially monstrous to set aside the elder for the younger. Yet the measure was a harsh necessity; a hak in the chain which could not be broken. The harassed nation insisted above all things that no doubt should hang over the future, and it was impossible in the existing complications to recognise the daughter of Catherine without excluding Elizabeth, and excluding the prince who was expected to follow her. By asserting her title, Mary was making herself the Danger to nucleus of sedition, which on her father's of Mary's at death would lead to a convulsion in the steads. Tealm. She might not mean it, but the result would not be affected by a want of purpose in herself; and it was possible that her resolution might create immediate and far more painful complications. The king's excommunication was imminent, and if the censures were enforced by the emperor, she would be thrust into the unpermitted position of her father's rival.

¹ Instructions to the Earls of Oxford, Essex, and Sumez, to remonstrate with the Lady Mary s Rolls House MS.

The political consequences of her conduct, notwithstanding, although a vident to statesmen, might well be concealed from a headstrong, passionate girl. There was no auspicion that she herself was encouraging any of these dangerous thoughts, and Henry The Ring looked upon her answer to Lord Hussey and approximate her letter to himself as expressions of petulant folly. Lord Oxford, the Earl of Essex, and the Earl of Sussex were directed to repair to Beaulieu, and explain to her the situation in which she had placed herself.

"Considering," wrote the king to them, "how highly such contempt and rebellion done by our metaler of daughter and her servants doth touch not her the transfer only us, and the surety of our honour and positive. person, but also the tranquillity of our realm; and not minding to suffer the permicious example hereof to thread far abroad, but to put remedy to the same in due time, we have given you commandment to declare to her the great folly, tementy, and indiscretion that she hath used herein, with the peril she hath incurred by reason of her so doing. By these her ungodly doings hitherto she hath most worthily deserved our high indignation and displeasure, and thereto no less pain and punition than by the order of the laws of our realm doth appertain in case of high treason, unless our mercy and elemency should be shewed in that behalf. [If, however, after] understanding our mind and pleasure, [she will] conform herself humbly and obediently to the observation of the same, according to the office and duty of a natural daughter, and of a true and faithful subject, she may give us cause hereafter to incline our fatherly pity to her reconciliation, her benefit and advancement." 1

The reply of Mary to this message is not discoverable; but it is certain that she persisted in her resolution, and clung either to her mother's "cause" or to her own rank and privilege, in sturdy defiance of her father. To punish her insubordination or to tolerate it was equally difficult; and the government might have been in serious embarrassment had not a series of discoveries, following rapidly one upon the other, explained the mystery of these proceedings, and opened a view with alarming clearness into the undercurrents of the feeling of the country.

Correspond-ages between Queen Cath emine, the Court of Rome, and the Em-

Information from time to time had reached Henry from Rome, relating to the correspondence between Catherine and the pope. Perhaps, too, he knew how assiduously she had importuned the emperor to force Clement to a decision.2 No effort, however, had been hitherto Instructions to the Earls of Oxford, Eastx, and Suggest, to remonstrate. with the Lady Mary: Rolls House MS.

On the 15th of November, Queen Catherine wrote to the Emperer made to interfere with her hospitalities, or to oblige her visitors to submit to scrutiny before they could be admitted to her presence. She was the mistress of her own court and of her own actions; and confidential agents, both from Rome, Brussels, and Spain, had undoubtedly passed and represed with reciprocal instructions and directions.

The crisis which was clearly approaching had obliged Henry, in the course of this autumn, to be more watchful; and about the end of October, or the beginning of November, two frame were re- two anatomored as having been at Bugden, whose at legitor, movements attracted suspicion from their anxiety to escape observation. Secret agents of the government, who had been "set" for the purpose, followed the friend to London, and notwithstanding "many wiles and cautells by them invented to escape," the suspected and after congretalizing him to his sections against the Turks, the continuet,

"And so our Lord in his mercy has worked so great a good for Christondots by your Highmon's hands, so has he salightened also his Holingas; and I and all this rearm have now a cure hope that, with the grace of Qod, his Holisons will slay this accord. Turk, this affair between the King my Lord and me. Second Park, I call it, from the mistorianes which, through his Holiness a long delay, have grown out of it, and are now so vest and of so ill example that I know not whether this or the Turk he the worst. Sarry am I to have been compelled to emperture your Majesty so often in this matter, for sere I am you do not need my pressing. But I am dalay to be so calamitors, my ever life is no unquist and so painful, and the upportunity to make an end new se convenient, that it seems as if God of his goodness had brought his Holisess and your Majesty together to bring about so great a good. I am forced to be importunate, and I implore your Highways for the passion of our Lord Josep Christ, that in return for the signs, benefits which God such day is beaping on you, you will accomplish for me this great blessing, and bring bie Holiness to a decision. Let him remember what he promised you at Hologua. The truth here is known, and he will thus destroy the hopes of those who personds the King my Lord. that he will never pass judgment." - Queen Cotherine to Charles V. : Mf. Amonese, Nevember 18, 1533.

* Letter to the King, giving an account of certain Prism Observants who had been about the Princess Downgov: Rolls State MS.

persons were arrested and brought before Cromwell.

"rectives." Cromwell "upon examination, could gather to be a nothing from them of any moment or great importance; "but, "entering on further communication," he said "he found one of them a very seditious person, and so committed them to ward." The king was absent from London, but had left directions that, in the event of any important occurrence of the kind, Archbishop Cranmer should be sent for; but Cranmer not being immediately at hand, Cromwell wrote to Henry for instructions; inasmuch has be said, "it is undoubted that they (the monks) have intended, and would confess, some great matter, if they might be examined as they ought to be — that is to say, by pains."

The curtain here falls over the two prisoners; we do not know whether they were tortured, whether they confessed, or what they confessed; but we may naturally connect this letter, directly or indirectly, with the events which immediately followed. In the middle of Completey, in which the November we find a commission sitting at Lambeth, composed of Cromwell, Cranmer, Princess and Latimer, ravelling out the threads of a implicated, story, from which, when the whole was disentangled, it appeared that by Queen Catherine, the Princes. Mary, and a large and formidable party in the country, the king, on the faith of a pretended revelation, was supposed to have forfeited the crown; that his death, either by visitation of God or by visitation of man, was daily expected; and that whether his death took place or not, a revolution was immediately looked for, which would place the princess on the throne.

The Nun of Kent, as we remember, had declared that if Henry persisted in his resolution of marrying

Anne, she was commissioned by God to tell him that he should lose his power and authority. She Prophecies of the Nun had not specified the manner in which the or went sentence would be carried into effect against him. The form of her threats had been also varied occasionally; she said that he should die, but whether by the hands of his subjects, or by a providential judgment, she left to conjecture; 1 and the period within which his punishment was to fall upon him was stated variously at one month or at six.2 She had attempted no secresy with these prophecies; she had confined herself in appearance to words; and the publicity which she courted having prevented suspicion of secret conspiracy, Henry quietly accepted the issue, and left the truth of the prophecy to be confuted by the event. He married. The one month passed; the six months passed; eight - nine months. His child was born and was baptized, and no divine thunder had interposed; only a mere harmless verbal thunder, from a poor old man at Rome. The illusion, as he imagined, had been lived down, and had expired of its own vanity. But the Nun and her friar advisers were counting

But the Nun and her friar advisers were counting on other methods of securing the fulfilment of the prophecy than supernatura, assistance. It is remarkable that, hypocrites and impostors as they knew themtelves to be, they were not without a half belief that some supernatural intervention was imminent; but the career on which they had entered was too fasci-

We remember the Northern prophecy, "In Rugland shall be slain the decorate Rose in his mother's belly," which the monks of Forness interpreted as meaning that "the King's Grace should do by the hands of pricess." — Vol. [. cap. 4.

^{*} Statutes of the Realm, 25 Henry VIII cap. 12. State Papers relating in Elizabeth Burton. Rolls House MS. Prior of Christ Church, Canterbury to Cromwell. Suppression of the Monadorics, p. 20.

The Name tion failed them. They were swept into the stream which was swelling to resist the Reformation, and allowed themselves to be hurried forward either to victory or to destruction.

The first revelation being apparently confuted by facts, a second was produced as an interpretation of it which, however, was not published like the other, but whispered in secret to persons whose dispositions were known.¹

"When the King's Grace," says the report of the commissioners, " had continued in good health. On the fullare of the bonour, and prosperity more than a month, Dr. first prophtoy an inter-Bocking shewed the said Nun, that as King pretation la discovered of Saul, abjected from his kingdom by God, yet s perilous kend. continued king in the sight of the world, so The king to declaced to her said revelations might be taken. And be in the conditting of Saul. therefore the said Nun, upon this information, after his reiection. forged another revelation, that her words should be understanded to mean that the King's Grace should not be king in the reputation or acceptation of God, not one month or one hour after that he married the Queen's Grace that now is. The first revelation had moved a great number of the king's subjects, both bigh and low, to grudge against the said marriage before it was concluded and perfected; and also induced such as were stiffly bent against that marriage, daily to look for the destruction of the King's Grace within a month after he married the Queen's Grace that now

¹ Thus Cromwell writes to Fisher: ¹⁸ My Lord, [the outward evidences that she was speaking train] moved you not to give medence to her, but only the very matter whereupon she made her false prophecies, to which matter yo were so affected — as yo be noted to be on all matters which yo take on er into — that nothing could come aritise that made for that parpose. ¹⁹ — Sugarcases of the Monasteries, p. 30.

is. And when they were deluded in that expectation, the second revelation was devised not only as an interpretation of the former, but to the intent to induce the king's subjects to believe that God took the King's Grace for no king of this realm; and that they should likewise take him for no righteous king, and themselves not bounden to be his subjects; which might have put the King and the Queen's Grace in jeopardy of their crown and of their issue, and the people of this realm in the country of their same and the people of this realm.

in great danger of destruction." 1

It was no light matter to pronounce the king to be in the position of Saul after his rejection; and read by the light of the impending excommunication, the Nun's words could mean nothing but treason. The speaker herself was in correspondence with the pope; she had attested her divine commission by miracles, and had been recognised as a saint by an Archbishop of Canterbury; the regular orders of the clergy throughout the realm were known to regard her as inspired; and when the commission recollected that the king was threatened further with dying " a villain's death "; and that these and similar prophecies were care- The prophe fully written out, and were in private circulation through the country, the matter assumed a dangerous complexion: it became at semonce essential to ascertain how far, and among what classes of the state, these things had penetrated. The Friars Mendicant were discovered to be in The Prints league with her, and these itinerants were business. ready-made musionaries of sedition. They had privlege of vagrancy without check or limit; and ow ing to their universal distribution and the freemeeonry among themselves, the secret disposition of every fam.

Papers relating to the Num of Kent. Rolls Home MB.

ily in England was intimately known to them. No movement, therefore, could be securely overlooked in which these orders had a share; the country might be indermined in secret; and the government might only earn their danger at the moment of explosion.

No secner, therefore, were the commissioners in possension in session of the general facts, than the principal parties - that is to say, the Nun herself and five of the monks of Christ Church at Canterbury with whom her intercourse was most constant, were sent to the Tower to be "examined," - the monks it is likely by "torture," if they could not otherwise be brought to confession. The Nun was certainly not On her first arrest, she was obstinate in maintaining her prophetic character; and she was detected in sending messages to her friends, " to animate them to adhere to her and to her prophecies." 1 her courage ebbed away under the hard reality of her position. She soon made a full confession, in the conwhich her accomplices joined her; and the half-completed web of conspiracy was ravelled out. They did not attempt to conceal that they had intended, if possible, to create an insurrection. The five monks -Father Bocking, Father Rich, Father Rys-≜ |lat is ob-inited of the by, Father Dering, and Father Goold - had Setande apo were imallassisted the Nun in inventing her "Reveented with lations"; and as apostles, they had travelled about the country to communicate them in whatever quarters they were likely to be welcome. When we remember that Archbishop Warlam had been a dupe of this woman, and that even Wolsey's experience and ability had not prevented him from believing in her power, we are not surprised to find high names among those who were implicate l. Vast numbers of abbota and priors, and of regular and secular clergy, had listened eagerly; country gentlemen also, and London merchants. The Bishop of Rochester had "wept for joy" at the first utterances of the inspired prophetess; and Sir Thomas More, "who at first did little regard the said revelations, afterwards did greatly rejoice to hear of them." We learn, also, that the Nun had continued to communicate with "the Lady Princess Docoages" and "the Lady Mary, her daughter."

1 Papers wilsting to the Nan of Kent: Rolls House MS

These were names which might have furnished cause for regret, but little for surprise or alarm. missioners must have found occasion for other feelings, however, when among the persons implicated were found the Countess of Salisbury and the The Countess Murchioness of Exeter, with their chaplains, and the Marhouseholds, and servants; Sir Thomas Arun- Exeter. del. Sir George Carew, and "many of the nobles of England." a A combination headed by the Countess of Salisbury, if she were supported even by a small section of the nobility, would under any circumstances have been dangerous; and if such a combination was formed in support of an invasion, and was backed by the blessings of the pope and the fanaticism of the clergy, the result might be serious indeed. So careful a silence is observed in the official papers on Danger of a this feature of the Nun's conspiracy, that it is wonfederary uncertain how far the countess had commit-

¹ Papers relating to the Nun of Kent.

^{9 25} Hen. VIII cap. 19.

Papers relating to the Nun of Kent: Rolle House MS. 25 Hou. YEL, esp 12. The "many" nobles are not more particularly designated in the afficial papers. It was not desirable to mention names when the afficient was to be gassed over.

them, which of itself was no alight evidence of disloyalty; and that the government were really alarmed may be gathered from the simultaneous arrest of Sir Arrest of the William and Sir George Neville, the brothers of Lord Latimer. The connexion and significance of these names I shall explain presently; in the meantime I return to the preparations which had been made by the Nun.

As the final judgment drew near, — which, unless the king submitted, would be accompanied with excommunication, and a declaration that the English nation was absolved from allegiance, — "the said false Nun," mays the report, "surmised herself to have made a petition to God to know, when fearful war should come, whether any man should take my Lady Mary's part or

The Num prophesses by revelation that no man should fear but that she should have succour and help enough; and that no man should put her from her right that she was born unto. And petitioning next to know when it was the pleasure of God that her revelations should be put forth to the world, she had answer that knowledge should be given to her ghostly father when it should be time."

With this information Father Goold had hastened the community down to Bugden, encouraging Catherine to persevere in her resistance; 2 and while the Report of the Communicates — Papers relating to the Nun of Kent: Rolls House MS.

^{*} Gooks, mys the Act of the Num's attainder, travelled to Bugden, "to animate the such Lady Princess to make commetion in the realm against our covereign lord; surmatting that the mid Nun should hear by revelation of God that the said Lady Catherine should prosper and do well, and that the lady Mary, should prosper and ruga in the realm?" — 30 Henry VIII cap. 18.

imperialists at Rome were pressing the pope for sentence (we cannot doubt at Catherine's instance), the Nun had placed herself in readiness to seize the opportunity when it offered, and to blow the trumpet of insurrection in the panic which might be surely looked for when that sentence should be published.

For this purpose she had organized, with considerable skill, a corps of fanatical friers, who, when the signal was given, were simultaneously to of them to throw themselves into the midst of the peo- mraotion ple, and call upon them to rise in the name of God. "To the intent," says the report, " to set forth this matter, certain spiritual and religious persons were appointed, as they had been chosen of God, to preach the false revelations of the said Nun, when the time should require, if warning were given them; and some of these preachers have confessed openly, and subscribed their names to their confessions, that if the Nunhad so sent them word, they would have preached to the kmg's subjects that the pleasure of God was that they should take him no longer for their king; and some of these preachers were such as gave themselves to great fasting, watching, long prayers, wearing of shirts of hair and great chains of iron about their middle, whereby the people had them in high estimation of their great holiness, - and this strait life they took on them by the counsel and exhortation of the said Nun." 1

Here, then, was the explanation of the attitude of Catherine and Mary. Smarting under injustice, and most naturally blending their private like instance. Quarrel with the cause of the church, they had listened to these disordered visions as to a message from heaven, and they had lent themselves to the first of those religious conspiracies which held England in chronic agitation for three quarters of a century. The innocent Saint at Bugden was the forerunner of the prisoner at Fotheringay; and the Observant friars, with their chair girdles and shirts of hair, were the antitypes of Parsons and Campion. How critical the situation of England really was, appears from the following letter of the French ambassador. The project for the marriage of the Princess Mary with the Dauphin had been revived by the Catholic party; and a private arrangement, of which this marriage was to form the connecting link, was contemplated between the Ultramontanes in France, the pope, and the emperor.

Beport of the Proceedings of the Nun of Kent: Rolle House MS Vot., IL. 19

D'Inteville to Cardinal Tournon.1

"My Lord, — You will be so good as to tell the Most Christian king that the emperor's ambassador has communicated with the old queen. The emperor sends a message to her and to her daughter, that he will not return to Spain till he has seen them restored to their rights.

The people are so much attached to the said ladies that they will rise in rebellion, and join any prince who will undertake their quarrel. You probably know from other quarters the intensity of this feeling. It is shared by all classes, high and low, and penetrates even into the royal household.

The nation is in marvellous discontent. Every one nut the relations of the present queen, is indignant on the ladies' account. Some fear the overthrow of religion; others fear war and injury to trade. Up to this time, the cloth, hides, wool, lead, and other merchandize of England have found markets in Flanders, Spain, and Italy; now it is thought navigation will be so dangerous that English merchants must equit their slope for war if they trade to foreign countries; and basides the risk of losing all to the enemy, the expense of the armament will swallow the profits of the voyage. In like manner, the emperor's subjects and the pope's subjects will not be able to trade with England. The coasts will be blockeded by the ships of the emperor and his allies; and at this moment men's fears are aggravated by the unseasonable weather throughout the summer, and the failure of the crops. There is not corn enough for half the ordinary consumption.

¹ MS. Bibliot. Impériq Paris. The letter is undated. It was apparently written in the autumn of 1533.

"The common people, foreseeing these inconveniences, are so violent against the queen, that they say a thousand shameful things of her, and of all who have supported her in her intrigues. On them is cast the edium of all the calamities anticipated from the war.

"When the war comes, no one doubts that the people will rebel as much from fear of the dangers which I have mentioned, as from the love which is felt for the two ladies, and especially for the Princess. She is so entirely beloved that, notwithstanding the law made at the last Parliament, and the menace of death contained in it, they persist in regarding her as Princess. No Parliament, they say, can make her anything but the king's daughter, born in marriage; and so the king and every one else regarded her before that Parliament.

"Lately, when she was removed from Greenwich, a vast crowd of women, wives of citizens and others, walked before her at their husbands' desire, weeping and crying that notwithstanding all she was Princess.

Some of them were sent to the Tower, but they would not retract.

"Things are now so critical, and the fear of war is so general, that many of the greatest merchants in London have placed themselves in communication with the emperor's ambassador, telling him, that if the emperor will declare war, the English nation will join him for the love they bear the Lady Mary.

"You, my Lord, will remember that when you were nore, it was said you were come to tell the king that be was excommunicated, and to demand the hand of the Princess for the Dauphin. The people were so delighted that they have never ceased to pray for you. We too, when we arrived in London, were told that the people were praying for us. They thought our embassy was to the Princess. They imagined her marriage with the Dauphin had been determined on by the two kings, and the satisfaction was intense and universal.

"They believe that, except by this marriage, they cannot possibly escape war; whereas, can it be brought about, they will have peace with the emperor and all other Christian princes. They are now so disturbed and so desperate that, although at one time they would have preferred a husband for her from among themselves, that they might not have a foreign king, there now is nothing which they desire more. Unless the Dauphin will take her, they say she will continue disinherited; or, if she come to her rights, it can only be by battle, to the great incommodity of the country. The Princess herself says publicly that the Dauphin a her husband, and that she has no hope but in him. I have been told this by persons who have heard it from her own lips.

"The emperor's ambassador inquired, after you came, whether we had seen her. He said he knew she was most anxious to speak with us; she thought we had permission to visit her, and she looked for good news He told us, among other things, that she had been more strictly guarded of late, by the orders of the queen that now is, who, knowing her feeling for the Dauphin, feared there might be some practice with her, or some attempt to carry her off.

" The Princess's ladies say that she calls herself the Dauphin's wife. A time will come, she says, when God will see that she has suffered pain and tribulation sufficient; the Dauphin will then demand her of the king her father, and the king her father will not be able to refuse.

"The lady who was my informant heard, also, from the Princess, that her governess, and the other attendants whom the queen had set to watch her, had assured her that the Dauphin was married to the daughter of the emperor; but she, the Princess, had answered it was not true — the Dauphin could not have two wives, and they well knew that she was his wife. they told her that story, she said, to make her despair, and agree to give up her rights; but she would never part with her hopes.

"You may have heard of the storm that broke out vetween her and her governess when we went to visit her little sister. She was carried off by force to her room, that she might not speak with us; and they could neither pacify her nor keep her still, till the gentleman who escorted us told her he had the king's commands that she was not to show herself while we were in the house. You remember the message the same gentleman brought to you from her, and the charge which was given by the queen.

Google

"Could the king be brought to consent to the marriage, it would be a fair union of two realms, and to annex Britain to the crown of France would be a great honour to our Sovereign; the English party desire nothing better; the pope will be glad of it; the pope fears that, if war break out again, France will draw closer to England on the terms which the King of England desires; and he may thus lose the French tribute as he has lost the English. He therefore will arge the emperor to agree, and the emperor will assist gladly for the love which he hears to his consin.

"If the emperor be willing, the King of England can then be informed; and he can be made to feel that, if he will avoid war, he must not refuse his consent. The king, in fact, has no wish to disown the Princess, and he knows well that the marriage with the Dauphin was once agreed on.

"Should he be unwilling, and should his wife's persuasions still have influence with him, he will hesitate before he will defy, for her sake, the King of France and the emperor united. His regard for the queen is less than it was, and diminishes every day. He has a new fancy, as you are aware."

The actual conspiracy, in the form which it had so far assumed, was rather an appeal to fanaticism than a plot which could have laid hold of the deeper mind of ...

It a des nouvelles amours. In a paper at Simancas, containing Nuevas de ingisterre, written about this time, is a similar account of the dislike of Anne and her family, as well as of the king's altered feelings towards her. Dicano anchors the la Anna è mal volute degli Si di Inghilterre si per la usa superbia, si anche per l'insolentia e mali portament, che fazue nel agno il fratelli e parenti di Anna, e che per questo il lie non la porte la affezione que soleva per che il Re festeggia una altra Donna della quale ne mostra esser inamorato, e molti Si di Inghilterra le ajutano nel seguir al preditto amor per daviar questo Re dalla pratica di Anna.

Google

ong PENN

THE

the country; but as an indication of the unrest which was stealing over the minds of men, it assumed un importance which it would not have received from its intrinsic character.

The guilt of the principal offenders admitted of ne doubt. As soon as the commissioners were satisfied that there was nothing further to be discov- merea to trial before the Star Chamber; and conviction followed as a matter of course.1

The unhappy girl finding herself at this conclusion, after seven years of vanity, in which she had played with popes, and queens, and princesses, and archbishops, now, when the dream was thus rudely broken, in the revulsion of feeling could see nothing in herself but a convicted impostor. We need not refuse to pity her. The misfortunes of her sickness had exposed her to temptations far beyond the strength of an ordinary woman; and the guilt which she passionately claimed for herself rested far more truly with the knavery of the Christ Church monks and the incredible folly of Archbishop Warham. But the times were too stern to admit of nice distinctions. No immediate sentence was pronounced, but it was thought desirable for the satisfaction of the people that a confession should be made in public by the Nun and her companions. The Sun-

¹ Hall

^{2 &}quot;1, dame Elizabeth Barton," she said, " do confine that I, most minetshis and wretched person, have been the original of all this mischief, and by my falsehood. I have deceived all these persons (the morsks who were her accomplicat), and many more; whereby I have most grievously offended. Alexighty God, and my most noble severeign the King's Grace. Wherefiere I humbly, and with heart most corrowful, desire you to pray to Alpalghty God for my miserable sine, and make supplication for me to my neversign for his gracious mercy and pardon." - Confession of Ellisabeth Bestout Rolls Bouse MS.

platform at Paul's Cross by the side of the pulpit, and when the sermon was over they one by one delivered their "bills" to the preacher, which by him were read to the crowd.

After an acknowledgment of their imposture the prisoners were remanded to the Tower, and their ultimate fate reserved for the consideration of parliament, which was to meet in the middle of January.

The chief offenders being thus disposed of, the council resolved next that peremptory measures should be taken with respect to the Princess Mary. Her establishment was broken up, and she was sent to The bounhold of the reside as the Lady Mary in the household of Princes the Princess Elizabeth — a hard but not unbroken us. wholesome discipline.* As soon as this was done, being satisfied that the leading shoot of the conspiracy The locality was broken, and that no immediate danger was now to be feared, they proceeded leisurely to follow the clue of the Nun's confession, and to extend their inquiries. The Countess of Salisbury was mentioned as one of the persons with eradishury whom the woman had been in correspond-This lady was the daughter of the Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. Her mother was a Neville, a child of Richard the King-maker, the famous Earl of Warwick, and her only brother had been murdered to secure the shaking throne of Honry

¹ Papers relating to Elizabeth Barton: Rolls House MS.

^{*} State Papers, Vol. I. p. 415

A curious trait in Mary's character may be mentioned in connection with this transfer. She had a voracious appetite, and in Elizabeth's household expenses an extra charge was made necessary of 26t. a-year for the most breakfasts and mest suppers "served into the Lady Mary's chamber." — Statement of the expenses of the Household of the Princess Elizabeth. Rolle House MB.

Margaret Plantagenet, in recompense for the VII. lost honours of the house, was made Countess of Salisbury in her own right. The title descended from her grandfather, who was Earl of Salisbury and Warwick; but the prouder title had been dropped as suggestive of dangerous associations. The Ear dom of Warwick remained in abeyance, and the eastle and the estates attached to it were forfeited to the Crown. countess was married after her brother's doubt to a Sir. Richard Pole, a supporter and relation 1 of the king: and when left a widow she received from Henry VIII. the respectful honour which was due to the most nobly born of his subjects, the only remaining Plantagenet of unblemished descent. In his kindness to her children the king had attempted to obliterate the recolled tion of her brother's wrongs, and she had been berself. selected to preside over the household of the Princess Mary. During the first twenty years of Henry's reign the counters seems to have acknowledged his attentions with loyal regard, and if she had not forgotten her birth and her childhood, she never connected herself with the attempts which during that time were made to revive the feuds of the houses. Richard de la Pole. nephew of Edward IV.," and called while he lived " the White Rose," had more than once endeavoured to excite an insurrection in the eastern counties; but Lady Salisbury was never suspected of holding intercourse with him; she remained aloof from political disputes, and in lofty retirement she was contented to forget her greatness for the sake of the Princess Mary, to whom she and her family were deeply attached. Her relations with the king had thus continued undisturbed until his second marriage. As the representative of the House of York she was the object of the hopes and affections of the remnants of their party, but ahe had betrayed no disposition to abuse her influence, or to disturb the quiet of the nation for personal ambition of her own.

· Be was killed at the battle of Pavia

I Bu in called frater constitutes. See Fuller's Worthin Vel III. p 128

If it be lawful to interpret symptoms in themselves trifling by the light of later events, it would seem as if her attitude now underwent a material change. Her son Reginald had already quarrelled with the Regionid Poloking upon the divorce. He was in suspicions connexion with the pope, and having been required to return home upon his allegiance, had refused obedience. His mother, and his mother's attached friend, the Marchioness of Exeter, we now find among those to whom the Nun of Kent communicated her prophecies and her plans. It does not seem that the countess thought at any time of reviving her own pretensions; it does seem that she was ready to build a throne for the Princess Mary out of the ruined supporters of her father's family. The power which she could wield might at any moment become formidable. two sons in England, Lord Montague and Sir Geoffrey The Marquia Pole. Her cousin, the Marquis of Exeter, a grandson himself of Edward IV., was, with the exception of the Duke of Norfolk, the most powerful nobleman in the realm; and he, to judge by events, was beginning to look coldly on the king.2 We find her surrounded also by the representatives of her mother's family, - Lord Abergavenny, who had been

I Countainay, Earl of Devonshire, married Catherine, daughter of Edwards

^{*} Bulieve mu, my lord, there are some here, and those of the greatest in the land, who will be indignant if the Pope confirm the centence against the late Queen. ~ D'Internie to Montmorency: The Pilgram, p. 37.

under suspicion when the Duke of Buckingham was executed, Sir Edward Neville, afterwards The executed, Lord Latimer, Sir George and Sir Northea. William Neville, all of them were her near connexions, all collateral heirs of the King-maker, inheriting the pride of their birth, and resentfully conscious of their fallen fortunes. The support of a party so composed would have added formidable strength to the preaching friars of the Nun of Kent; and as I cannot doubt that the Non was endeavouring to press her intrigues in a quarter where disaffection if created would be The strength most dangerous, so the lady who ruled this Book has party with a patriarchal authority had listened to her suggestions; and the repeated interviews with her which were sought by the Marchioness of Exeter were rendered more than suspicious by the secreay with which these interviews were conducted.1

These circumstances explain the arrest, to which I alluded above, of Sir William and Sir George Recommender. Neville, brothers of Lord Latimer. They of Sir William were not among "the many noblemen" to George whom the commissioners referred; for their best confessions remain, and contain no allusion to the Nun; but they were examined at this particular time on general suspicion; and the arrest, under such circumstances, of two near relatives of Lady Salisbury, indicates clearly an alarm in the council, lest she might be contemplating some serious movements. At any rate, either on her account or on their own, the Nevilles fell under suspicion, and while they had no crimes to reveal their depositions, especially that of Sir William Neville, furnish singular evidence of the temper of the times.

¹ She once rade to Canterbury, diagnised as a servant, with only a young girl for 'ar companion — Depositions of Sir Geoffes y Pole. Rule House

The confession of the latter begins with an account confession of the loss of certain silver spoons, for the street with recovery of which Sir William sent to a wizard who resided in Circnester. The wizard took the opportunity of telling Sir William's fortune: his wife was to die, and he bimself was to marry an beiress, and he made a baron; with other prospective splendeurs. The wizard concluded, however, with recommending him to pay a visit to another dealer in the dark art more learned than himself, whose name was Jones, at Oxford.

"So after that," said Sir William [Midsammer, 1532], " I went to Oxford, intending that my brother George and I should kill a buck with Sir Simon Harcourt, which he had promised me; and there at Oxford, in the said Jones's chamber, I did see certain stillatories, alembics, and other instruments of glass, and also a sceptre and other things, which he said did apportain to the conjuration of the four kings; and also an image of white metal; and in a box, a serpent's skin, as he said, and divers books and things, whereof one was a book which he said was my Lord Cardinal's, having pictures in it like angels. He told me he could make rings of gold, to obtain favour of great men; and said that my Lord Cardinal had such; and promised my said brother and me, either of us, one of them; and also he showed me a round thing like a ball of crystal.

"He said that if the King's Grace went over to France [the Calais visit of October, 1532], his Grace should marry my Lady Marchioness of Pembroke before that his Highness returned again; and that it would be dangerous to his Grace, and to the most part of the noblemen that should go with him; saying also that he had written to one of the king's council to advise his Highness not to go over, for if he did, it should not be for his Grace's profit."

1680.]

The wizard next pretended that he had seen a vision of a certain room in a tower, in which a spirit had appeared with a coat of arms in his hand, and had " delivered the same to Sir William Neville." The arms being described as those of the Warwick family, Sir William, his brother, and Jones rode down from Oxford to Warwick, where they went over the castle. The wizard professed to recognise in a turret chamber the room in which he had seen the spirit, The Novilles and he prophesied that Sir William should the Karldon recover the earldom, the long-coveted prize of Warvich.

of all the Neville family.

On their return to Oxford, Jones, continues Sir. William, said further, "That there should be a field in the north about a se'nnight before Christmas, in which my Lord my brother [Lord Latimer] should be slain: the realm should be long without a king; and much robbery would be within the realm, specially of abbeys and religious houses, and of rich men, as merchants, graziers, and others; so that, if I would, he at that time would advise me to find the means to enter into the said castle for mine own safeguard, and divers persons would resort unto me. None of Cadwallader's blood. he told me, should reign more than twenty-four prophery years; and also that Prince Edward [son of that rone of Henry VI. and Margaret of Anjou, killed at der's blood moult reign Tewkesbury] had issue a son which was more than twenty-home conveyed over sea; and there had issue a son ? which was yet alive, either in Saxony or Almayne; and that either he or the King of Scots should reign pext after the King's Grace that now is. To all which I answered," Sir William conc'uded, "that there is nothing which the will of God is that a man shall obtain, but that he of his goodness will put in his mind the way whereby he shall come by it; and that surely I had no mind to follow any such fashion; and that, also, the late Duke of Buckingham and others had cast themselves away by too much trust in prophecies, and other jeoparding of themselves, and therefore I would in no wise follow any such way. He answered, if I would not, it would be long ere I obtained it. Then I said I believed that well, and if it never came, I trusted to God to live well enough." 1

Sir George Neville confirmed generally his brother's story, protesting that they had never intended treason, and that "at no time had he been of counsel" when any treason was thought of.2

The wizard himself was next sent for. The prophecies about the king he denied wholly. The wheel IUMINODAI admitted that he had seen an angel in a dream before the Conneil giving Sir William Neville the shield of the earldom in Warwick Castle, and that he had accompanied the two brothers to Warwick, to examine the Beyond that, he said that he knew nothing either of them or of their intentions. He declared himself a good subject, and he would " jeop-He undertaken to ard his life " to make the philosopher's stone make the philosofor the king in twelve months if the king ther's stone. and will pleased to command him. He desired "no supart ble life upon it. longer space than twelve months upon silver and twelve and a half upon gold "; to be kept in prison till he had done it; and it would be "better to the King's Grace than a thousand men." *

Confession of Sir George Neville: Ibid.
 Confession of the Oxford Wigard: Ibid.

¹ Confession of Sir William Noville: Rolls House MB.

The result of these examinations does not appear, except it be that the Nevilles were dismissed without punishment; and the story itself may be thought too trifling to have deserved a grave notice. see in it, however, an illustration very noticeworthy of the temper which was working in spittion of the country. The suspicion of treason in the Neville family may not have been confirmed, although we see them casting longing looks on the lost inheritance of Warwick; but their confessions betray the visions of impending change, anarchy, and confusion, which were haunting the popular imagination. A craving after prophecies, a restless eagerness to search into the future by abnormal means, had infected all ranks from the highest to the lowest; and such symptoms, when they appear, are a sure evidence of approaching disorder, for they are an evidence of a present madness which has brought down wisdom to a common level with folly. At such times, the idlest fancy is more potent with the mind than the soundest arguments of reason. The understanding abdicates its functions; and men are given over, as if by magic, to the enchantments of insanity.

Phenomena of this eccentric kind always accompany periods of intellectual change. Most men live and think by habit; and when habit fails them, they are like unskilful sailors who have lost the landmarks of their course, and have no compass and no celestial charts by which to steer. In the years which preceded the French Revolution, Cagliostro was the companion of princes, — at the dissolution of paganism the practicers of curious arts, the witches and the necromancers, were the sole objects of reverence in the Roman world; and so, before the Reformation, archbishops and cardinals saw an inspired prophetess in a Kentish servantgirl; Oxford heads of colleges sought out heretics with the help of astrology; Anne Boleyn blessed a basin of rings, her royal fingers pouring such virtue into the metal that no disorder could resist it; 1 Wolsey had a magic crystal; and Cromwell, while in Wolsey's household, "did haunt to the company of a wizard." 2 These things were the counterpart of a religion which taught that slips of paper, duly paid for, could secure indemnity for sin. It was well for England that the chief captain at least was proof against the epidemic—no random scandal seems ever to have whispered that such delusions had touched the mind of the king."

While the government were prosecuting these inquiries at home, the law at the Vatican had run its course; November passed, and as no submission had arrived, the sentence of the 12th of July came into force, and the king, the queen, and the Archbishop of Canterbury were declared to have incurred the threatened censures.

The privy council met on the 2d of December, and it was determined in consequence that copies of the "Act of Appeals," and of the king's "provocation" to a general council, should be fixed without delay on every church door in England. Protests were at the same time to be drawn up and sent into Flanders, and to the other courts in Europe, "to the intent the falsehood and injustice of the Bishop of Rome might appear to all the world." The de-

¹ Queen Anne Boleyn to Gardiner: Burnet's Collectance, p. 355. Office for the Consecration of Cramp Ringer 1bid.

^{*} So at least the Oxford Wizard said that Sir William Neville had told him. — Confession of the Wizard: Rolls House MS. But the authority is ant good.

Herry alone never listened seriously to the Nun of Kent.

fences of the country were to be looked to: and "spies" to be sent into Scotland to see " what they intended there," " and whether they would confeder themselves with any outward princes." Finally, it was Renewed proposed that the attempt to form an alliance of Protection with the Lutheran powers should be renewed tant league. on a larger scale; that certain discreet and grave persons should be appointed to conclude " some league or amity with the princes of Germany," - " that is to say, the King of Poland, the King of Hungary,1 the Duke of Saxony, the Duke of Bavaria, the Duke of Brandenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and other potentates." * Vaughan's mission had been merely tentative, and had failed. Yet the offer of a league, offensive and defensive, the immediate and avowed object of which was a general council at which the Protestants should be represented, might easily succeed where vague offers of amity had come to nothing. The formation of a Protestant alliance, however, would have been equivalent to a declaration of war against Catholic Europe; and it was a step which could not be taken, consistently with the Treaty of Calais, without first communicating with Francis.

Henry, therefore, by the advice of the council, wrote a despatch to Sir John Wallop, the ambassa— The King writes to dor at Paris, which was to be laid before the Prencis.

French court. He explained the circum— him with the sug— this explained in which he was placed, with the sug— this explained to him. He gave a list of the princes with whom he had been desired by his ministers to connect himself, — and the object was

Acts of Council: State Papers, Vol. I. pp 414, 415.
 vol. ii. 13

⁴ John of Transylvania, the rival of Perdinand. His designation by the title of king in an English state paper was a menace that, if driven to aptenuities, Henry would support him against the empire.

nothing less than a coalition of Northern Europe. He recapitulated the injuries which he had received from the pope, who at length was studying " to subvert the rest and peace of the realm " : "yea, and so much as in him was, utterly to destroy the same." The nobles and council, he said, for their A Protestant own sake as well as for the sake of the kingtiliance hight desir dom, had entreated him to put an end, once able to put so for all, to the pope's usurpation; and to inof the pope. vite the Protestant princes, for the universal weal of Christendom, to unite in a common alliance, In his present situation he was inclined to act upon this advice. " As concerning his own realm, he had already taken such order with his nobles and subjects, as he would shortly be able to give to the pope such a buffet as he never had heretofore;" but as a German alliance was a matter of great weight He will not without first and importance, "although," he concluded, ga di usaco "we consider it to be right expedient to set forth the same with all diligence, yet we intend nothing to do therein without making our good brother first privy thereunto. And for this cause and consideration only, you may say that we have at this time addressed these letters unto you, commanding you to declare our said purpose unto our good brother, and to require of him on our behalf his good address and best advice. Of his answer we require you to advertise us with all disigence, for according thereunto we intend to attemper our proceedings. We have lately had advertisements how that our said good brother should, by the labour of divers affectionate Papists, be minded to set forth something with his clergy in adcancement of the pope and his desires. This we cannot believe that he will do."1

¹ Henry VIII. to Sir John Wallop: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 684.

The meaning of this letter lies upon the surface. If the European powers were determined to leave him no alternative, the king was prepared to ally himself with the Lutherans. He will job demand the poper than the poper than the limit to the alliance, it was evident that he would prefer, where the poper had ceased to be an object of concern to him; but he could not contemplate, without extreme unwillingness, a separation from the orderly governments who professed the Catholic faith. The pope had injured him; Francis had deceived him; they had tempted his patience because they knew his disposition. The limit of endurance had been reached at length; yet, on the verge of the concluding rupture, he turned once more, as if to offer a last opportunity of peace.

The reply of Francis was an immediate mission of the Bishop of Bayonne (now Bishop of Mission of Paris), first into England, and from England of Paris to to Rome, where he was to endeavour, to the least of his ability, to seam together the already gaping rent in the church with fair words — a hopeless task—the results of which, however, were unexpectedly considerable, as will be presently seen.

Meanwhile, on the side of Flanders, the atmosphere was dubious and menacing. The refugee Threatening friars, who were reported to be well supplied the Court of the Court of with money from England, were labouring to Erusels.

exasperate the people, Father Peto especially distinguishing himself upon this service. The English am-

I Stophen Vaughan to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 617. Vaughan describes Peto with Shakespearian raciness. "Peto is an isocrite knave, as the most part of his brethren be, a well; a tiger clad in a sheep's skin. It is a perilous knave—a raiser of sedition—an evil reporter of the Klag's Highness—a prophecyer of misch of—a fellow I would wish to bassador. Sir John Hacket, still remained at Brussels. and the two governments were formally The English ambusador. at peace; but when Hacket required the requests the queen-regent to forbid the publication of queen-regent to forbid the publication the brief of July in the Netherlands, he was of the papel sensures in met with a positive refusal. " M. Ambas-Planders. The refuses. sador," she said, "the Emperor, the King of Hungary, the Queen of France, the King of Portugal, and I, understand what are the rights of our aunt - our duty is to her - and such letters of the pope as come hither in her favour we shall obey. Your master has no right to complain either of the emperor or of myself, if we support our aunt in a just cause." 1 At the same time, formal complaints were made by Charles of the personal treatment of Queen Catherine, and the clouds appeared to be gathering for a storm. Yet here, too, there was an evident shrinking from extremities. A Welsh gentleman had been at Brussels to offer his services against Henry, and had met with apparent coldness. Sir John Hacket wrote, on the 15th of December, that he was assured by well-informed persons, that so long as Charles lived, he would never be the first to begin a war with England, " which would rebound to the destruction of the December 28. Low Countries." A week later, when the queen-regent was suffering from an alarming illness, he said it was reported that, should she die, Catherine or Mary, if either of them was allowed be in the king's hands, and to be shamefully punished. Would God I sould get him by any policy I will work what I can. Be sure be shall do nothing, nor pretent to do nothing, in these parts, that I will not find means to cause the King's Highness to know. I have laid a bait for him. He is not able to wear the clokys and cucullys that be sent him eut of England, they be so many."

¹ Hacket to Henry VIII.: Scote Papers, Vol. VII. p. 538.

9 Ibid. p. 530

entance of the Low Countries." This was propose to a generous step, if the emperor seriously make Catherloo of the Nun of Amidst these uneasy symptoms at home and abroad, parliament reassembled on the 15th of Jan-January 1 Morting of uary. It was a changed England since these parliament men first came together on the fall of Wolsey. Session after session had been spent in clipping the roots of the old tree which had overshadowed them for centuries. On their present meeting they were to finish their work, and lay it prostrate for ever. Negotiations were still pending with the See of Rome, and this momentous session had closed before the final catastrophe. The measures which were passed in the course of it are not, therefore, to be looked upon as adopted hastily, in a spirit of retaliation, but as the consistent accomplishment of a course which had been deliberately adopted, Hacket to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 53t.

^{*} So at least Heavy supposed, if we may judge by the resolutions of the Council "for the fortification of all the frontiers of the realm, as well upon the seases as the frontiers foreaneast Scotland." The fortresses and havens were to be "fortefyed and munited;" and money to be sent to York to be in readings; "if any huminess should happen." — Ib d. Yol. 1 p. 411.

to reverse the positions of the civil and spiritual authority within the realm, and to withdraw the realm itself from all dependence on a foreign power.

The Annates and Firstfruits' Bill had not yet received the royal assent; but the pope had refused to grant the bulls for bishops recently appointed, and he was no longer to receive payment for services which he refused to render. Peter's pence were still paid, and might continue to be paid, if the pope would recollect himself; but, like the Sibyl of Cuma, Henry destroyed some fresh privilege with each delay of justice, demanding the same price for the preservation of what remained. The secondary streams of tribute now only remained to the Roman See; and communion with the English church, which it was for Clement to accept or refuse.

The circumstances under which the session opened were, however, grave and saddening. multaneously with the concluding legislation on the church, the succession to the throne was to be determined in terms which might, perhaps, be accepted as a declaration of war by the emperor; and the affair of the Nun of Kent had rendered necessary an inquiry into the conduct of honoured members of the two Houses, who were lying under the shadow of high Perlis of the treason. The conditions were for the first becomeston. time to be plainly seen under which the Reformation was to fight its way. The road which lay before it was beset not merely with external obstacles, which a strong will and a strong hand could crush, but with the phantoms of dying faiths, which haunted the hearts of all living men; the superstitions, the prejudices, the hopes, the fears, the passions, which swayed stormily and fitfully through the minds of every actor in the great drama.

The uniformity of action in the parliament of 1529, during the seven years which it continued, is crowned due to the one man who saw his way distinct—way deady. Iy, Thomas Cromwell. The nation was substantially united on the divorce question, could the divorce be secured without a rupture with the European powers. It was united also on the necessity of limiting the jutisdiction of the clergy, and cutting short the powers of the consistory courts. But in questions of "opinion" there was the most sensitive jealousy; and from the combined instincts of prejudice and conservatism, the majority of the country in a count of heads would un doubtedly have been against a separation from Rome.

The clergy professed to approve the acts of the government, but it was for the most part with the unwilling acquiescence of men who were without courage to refuse. The king was divided against him- Struggle to self. Nine days in ten he was the clear- Broad against him- Struggle to self. headed, energetic, powerful statesman; on the and darkage. tenth he was looking wistfully to the superstition which he had left, and the clear sunshine was darkened with theological clouds, which broke in lightning and perse-Thus there was danger at any moment of a reaction, unless opportunity was reaction. taken at the flood, unless the work was executed too completely to admit of reconsideration, and the nation committed to a course from which it was impossible to recede. The action of the conservatives was paralysed for the time by the want of a fixed purpose. The various parts of the movement were so skilfully linked together, that partial opposition to it was impossible; and so long as the people had to choose between the pope and the king, their loyalty would not allow them to hesitate. But very few men actively adhered to Cromwell. Cromwell had struck the line on which the forces of nature were truly moving, of Cromthe extreme parties, but of the joint action of their op-To him belonged the rare privilege of posing forces. genius, to see what other men could not see : and therefore he was condemned to rule a generation which hated him, to do the will of God, and to perish in his success. He had no party. By the nobles he was regarded with the same mixed contempt and fear which had been felt for Wolsey. The Protestants, perhaps, knew what he was, but he could only purchase their toleration by himself checking their extravagance. Latimer was the only person of real power on whose friendship he could calculate, and Latimer was too plain-spoken on dangerous questions to be useful as a political supporter.

The session commenced on the 15th of January.

The first sten was to receive the final submission of convocation. The undignified resistance was The derigi at last over, and the clergy had promised to make thele final anhmisaton. abstain for the future from unlicensed legisla-To secure their adherence to their engagements, an act 1 was passed to make the breach of Mixed Commission. Inthat engagement penal; and a commission tended for the revision of thirty-two persons, half of whom were to of the Canon be laymen, was designed for the revision of the Canon law.

The next most important movement was to assiminate the trials for heresy with the trials for the law for the process other criminal offences. I have already explained at length the manner in which the bishops abused their judicial powers. These powers were not absolutely taken away, but ecclesiastics were no longer permitted to arrest ex officio and examine at their pleasure. Where a charge of heresy was to be brought against a man, presentments were to be made by lawful witnesses before justices of the peace; and then, and not otherwise, he might fall under the authority of the "ordinary." Secret examinations were declared illegal. The offender was to be tried in open court, and, previous to his trial, had a right to be admitted to bail, unless the bishop could show cause to the contrary to the satisfaction of two magistrates."

^{*} A design which unfortunately was not put in effect. In the hurry of the time it was allowed to drop.

^{. 25} Hen. VIII. cap. 19.

This was but a slight instalment of lenity; but it was an indication of the turning tide. Limited as it was, the act operated as an effective check upon persecution till the passing of the Six Articles Bill.

Turning next to the relations between England and Rome, the parliament reviewed the Annates The Annates Act," which had been left unratified in the Act having hope that the pope might have consented to a "oyal access, compromise, and that " by some gentle ways the said exaction might have been redressed and reformed." The expectation had been disappointed. The pope had not condescended to reply to the communication which had been made to him, and the act had in consequence received the royal assent. An alteration had thus become necessary in the manner of presentathe existing practice have been already de- bishops scribed. By the Great Charter the chapters had acquired the right of free election. A congé d'élire was granted by the king on the occurrence of a vacancy, with no attempt at a nomination. The chapters were empposed to make their choice freely, and the name of the bishop-elect was forwarded to the pope, who returned the Pallium and the Bulls, receiving the Annates in exchange. The pope's part in the matter was now terminated. No Annates would be sent any longer to Rome, and no Bulls would be returned from Rome. The appointments lay between the chapters and the crown; and it might have seemed, at first sight, as if it would have been sufficient to omit the reference to the papacy, and as if the remaining forms might continue as they were. The chapters, however, had virtually long ceased to elect The Chaplers bad freely; the crown had absorbed the entire pad the functions of presentation, sometimes appointprivileges granted to them by the Great Charing foreigners,1 sometimes allowing the great ecclesiastical ministers to nominate themselves: while the rights of the chapters, though existing in theory, were not officially recognised either The soutes by the pope or by the crown. The king aftion had virtusty rested fected to accept the names of the prelateswith the elect, when returned to him from Rome, as nominations by the pope; and the pope, in communicating with the chapters, presented them with their hishops as from himself.3 The papal share in the mat-

1 St Henry VIII. cap. 14. 23 Henry VIII. cap 20.

Ŧ

² At this very time Campegglo was Bishop of Salisbury, and Ghinucci, who had been acting for Henry at Rome, was Bishop of Worcester. The Act by which they were deprived speaks of these two appointments as now-incident by the king. — 25 Henry VIII. cap. 27

Wolsey hald three bishopries and one archbishoprie, besides the abbay of St. Albana.

Thus when Wolsey was presented, in 1514, to the See of Lincoln, Lee X. writes to his beloved son Thomas Wolsey how that in his great care for the interests of the Church, "Nos hodie Ecclesia Lincolnicasi, to in episcopum et pasterem præficere intendimas." He then informs the Chapter of Lincoln of the appointment; and the king, in granting the temporalities, continues the fiction without seeming to recognise it: — "Cum dominus summus Pontifex unper vacante Ecclesia cathedrali personant fidelia electri nestri Thomas Wolsey, in ipens Eccresia episcopum preferent, nes," &c. — See the Acts in Rymer, Vol. VI. part 1, pp. 55-57.

ter was a shadow, but it was acknowledged under the forms of courtesy; the share of the chapters was wholly and absolutely ignored. The crisis of a revolution was not the moment at which their legal privileges could be safely restored to them. The problem of rearrangement was a difficult one, and it was possessy of mot in a manner pocularly English. practice of granting the congé d'élire to the d'une. chapters on the occurrence of a vacancy, which had fallen into descetude, was again adopted, and the church resumed the forms of liberty: but the idence to elect a bishop was to be accompanied with the name of the person whom the chapter was required to elect; and if within twelve days the person so named had not been chosen, the nomination of the crown was to become absolute, and the chapter would incur a Premunire.1

1 25 Henry VIII cap 20. The profixieting unreal the with respect to the election of bishops explain the unreality of the new arrangement, and divert it of the character of wanton tyranny with which it appeared growth facts to press upon the Chapters. The history of this statute is curious, and purhaps explains the intentions with which it was originally passed. It was repealed by the 21 of the 1st of Edward VI. on the ground that the liberty of election was merely nominal, and that the Chapters neight to be telieved of responsibility when they had no power of choice. Direct nomination by the crown was asbitituted for the conce d'elere, and remained the practice (iii) the reaction under Mary, when the indefinite system was resumed which had existed before the Reformation. On the accessing of Elizabeth, the statute of 25 Henry VIII, was again exacted. The more complicated process of Henry was preferred to the more simple one of Edward, and we are naturally led to ask the reason of so singular a profitence. I cannot but think that it was this. The Council or Regency under Edward VI, treated the Church, as an institution of the State, while Henry and Ehrabeth endeavoured (under difficulties) to regard it under its more Inthelia aspect of an organic body. So long as the Reformation was in progress, it was necessary to prevent the introduct upon the beach of bishops of Homanizing tendencies, and the deans and chapters were therefore protected by a strong hand from their own possible matakes. But the form of liberty was consected to them, not, I hope, to place deliberately a body of clergy-men in a degrading position, but in the belief that at no distant time the (Thurc's eaght be allowed without danger to recuine some da gree of self-governm mt.

This act, which I conceive to have been more atbitrary in form than in intention, was followed by a closing attack upon the remaining "exactions" of the Bishop of Rome. The Annates were gone. were yet to go, "Pensions, Censes, Peter's Peteria Penne and Pence, Procurations, Fruits, Suits for Proviother forms of tribute sion, Delegacies and Rescripts in causes of paid to Home atolished. Contention and Appeals, Jurisdictions legatine -also Dispensations, Licenses, Faculties, Grants, Relaxations, Writs called Perinde valere, Rehabilitations, Abolitions," with other unnamed (the parliament being wearied of naming them) "infinite sorts of Rules, Briefs, and instruments of sundry natures, names, and All these were perennially open sluices, which had drained England of its wealth for centuries, returning only in showers of paper; and the Commons were determined that streams so unremunerative should flow no longer. They conceived that they had been all along imposed upon, and that the "Bishop of Rome was to be blamed for having allured and beguiled the English nation, persuading them that he had power to dispense with human laws, uses, and customs, contrary to right and conscience." If the king so pleased, therefore, they would not be so beguiled any Con dictional a bolition of more. These and all similar exactions should cease; and all powers claimed by the Bishop of Rome within the realm should cease, and should be transferred to the crown. At the same time they would not press upon the pope too hardly; they would repeat the same conditions which they had offered with the Annates. He had received these revenues as the supreme judge in the highest court in Europe, and he might retain his revenues or receive compon-months al-loved to the sation for them, if he dared to be just. It might retain his revenues or receive compenwas for himself to resolve, and three months pop to a-

In conclusion, the Commons thought it well to assert that they were separating, not from the The Comchurch of Christ, but only from the papacy. Feneral des A judge who allowed himself to be overawed to reparting the against his conscience by a secular power, population that against his conscience by a secular power, are not separately could not any longer be recognised; but no rating from the unity of the unity of the falls. afterwards "interpreted or expounded, that his Grace (the king), his nobles and subjects, intended by the same to decline or vary from the congregation of Christ's church in anything concerning the articles of the Catholic faith of Christendom, or in any other things declared by the Holy Scripture and the Word of God necessary for salvation; but only to make an ordinance, by policies necessary and convenient, to repress vice, and for the good conservation of the realm in peace, unity, and tranquillity, from ravin and spoil - ensuing much the old antient customs of the realm in that behalf." 1

The most arduous business was thus finished—the most painful remained. The Nun of Kent and her accomplices were to be proceeded against by act of parliament; and the bill of their attainder was presented for the first time in the House of Lords, on the 18th of February. The offence of the principal conspirators was plainly high treason; their own confessions removed uncertainty; the guilt was clear—the sentence was inevitable. But the fault of those who had been listeners only was less easy of measurement, and might vary from comparative innocence to a definite breach of allegiance.

1 25 Henry VIII. cap. 21.

The government were unwilling to press with severity on the noble lords and ladies whose names had been unexpectedly brought to light; and there were two men of high rank only, whose complicity it was thought necessary to notice. The Bishop of Rochaster and Sir Rochester's connexion with the Nun had been culpably encouraging; and the responsibility of Sir Thomas More was held also to be very great in having countenanced, however lightly, such perilons schemers.

In the bill, therefore, as it was first read, More and Declared in Fisher found themselves declared guilty of the first misprision of treason. But the object of this reading of the bill rully of mis measure was rather to warn than to punish, prision of treason. nor was there any real intention of continuing their prosecution. Cromwell, under instructions from the king, had communicated privately with both of Private com- them. He had sent a message to Fisher munications through his brother, telling him that he had are made to them by only to ask for forgiveness to receive it; 1 and Cromwell that the he had begged More through his son-in-law, king with accept their Mr. Roper, to furnish him with an explicit spoingy. account of what had passed at any time between himself and the Nun, with an intimation that, if honestly made, it would be accepted in his favour.

These advances were met by More in the spirit in which they were offered. He heartily thanked Cromwell, "reckoning himself right deeply beholden to

I least you no heavy words, but words of great comfort; willing your brother to show you how benign and merciful the prince was; and that I thought it expedient for you to write unto his Highness, and to recognize your offence and to desire his pardon, which his Grace would not deay you now in your age and sickness — Cromwell to Fisher: Suppression of me Monagieries, p. 27.

² Sir Thomas More to Crosswell: Burnet's Collectones, p. 850.

bim;" 1 and replied with a long, minute, and evidently veracious story, detailing an interview or transwhich he had held with the woman in the pleasable chapel of Sion Monastery. He sent at the resonably same time a copy of a letter which he had written to her, and described various conversations with the friars who were concerned in the forgery. He shid not deny that he had believed the Nun to have been inspired, or that he had heard of the language which she was in the habit of using respecting the king. He protested, however, that he had himself never entertained a treasonable thought. He told Cromwell that " he had done a very meritorious deed in bringing forth to light such detestable hypocrisy, whereby every other wretch might take warning, and be feared to set forth their devilish dissembled falsehoods under the manner and colour of the wonderful work of God." 2 offence had not been great. His acknowledgments were open and unreserved; and Cromwell laid his letter before the king, adding his own intercession that the matter might be passed over. Henry consented, expressing only his grief and concern that Sir Horals and Thomas More should have acted so unwisely." 400-4-He required, nevertheless, as Cromwell suggested, that a formal letter should be written, with a confession of fault, and a request for forgiveness. More obeyed; he wrote, gracefully reminding the king of a promise when he resigned the chancellorship, that in any suit which he might afterwards have to his Grace, either touching his honour or his profit, he should find his Highness his good and gracious lord.4 Henry ac-

Sir Thomas More to Cromwell: Burnet's Collectores, p. 350.

[•] Ibid.

More to Cremwell: Strype's Memoriale, Vol. I. Appendix, p. 196

⁴ More to the King: Ellie, first series. Vol. II. p. 47

knowledged his claim; his name was struck out of the bill, and the prosecution against him was dropped.

Fisher's conduct was very different; his fault had been far greater than More's, and promises Maher is obstinate. more explicit had been held out to him of His fault had been forgiveness. He replied to these promises by desper that More's: yel an elaborate and ridiculous defence, - not writing to the king, as Cromwell desired him, but vindicating himself as having committed no fault; although he had listened eagerly to language which was only pardonable on the assumption that it was inspired, and had encouraged a nest of fanatics by his The Nun " had showed him not," childish credulity. he said, " that any prince or temporal lord should put the king in danger of his crown." He knew nothing of the intended insurrection. He believed the woman to have been a saint; he supposed that she had herself told the king all which she had told to him; Polly of his and therefore he said that he had nothing for which to reproach himself.\(^1\) He was unable to see that the exposure of the imposture had imparted a fresh character to his conduct, which he was bound to regret. Knowingly or unknowingly, he had lent his countenance to a conspiracy; and so long as he refused to acknowledge his indiscretion, the government necessarily would interpret his actions in the manner least to his advantage.

If he desired that his conduct should be forgotten, it was indispensable that he should change his attitude, and so Cromwell warned him. "Ye desire," the latter wrote, "for the passion of Christ, that ye be no more quickened in this matter; for if ye be put to that strait ye will not lose your soul, but ye will speak as your conscience leadeth you; with many more words of great courage. My Lord, if ye had taken my counsel sent unto you by your brother, and followed the same, submitting yourself by your letter to the King's Grace for your offences in this behalf, I would have trusted that ye should never be quickened in the matter more. But now where ye take upon you to defy the whole matter as ye were in no default, I cannot so far promise you. Wherefore, my Indones Lord, I would eftsoons advise you that, lay- more urges no to apol ing apart all such excuses as ye have alleged own. in your letters, which in my opinion be of small effect, we beseech the King's Grace to be your gracious lord. and to remit unto you your negligence, oversight, and offence committed against his Highness in this behalf; and I dare undertake that his Highness shall benignly accept you into his gracious favour, all matter of displeasure past afore this time forgotten and forgiven." 1

³ Cromwell to Fisher: Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 27, et seq.

Fisher must have been a hopelessly impracticable person. Instead of following More's example, and accepting well-meant advice, he persisted in the same tone, and drew up an address to the House of Lords, in which he repeated the defence to the House of Lords, in which he repeated the defence which he had made to Cromwell. He expressed no sorrow that he had been engaged in a criminal intrigue, no pleasure that the intrigue had been discovered; and he doggedly adhered to his assertions of his own innocence.

There was nothing to be done except to proceed with his attainder. The bill passed three words.

The Dill readings, and the various prisoners were process.

TOL. IL.

14

Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 27, et seq.
 John Fisher to the Lords in Parliament. Ellis third series, Yol. 11

nummoned to the Star Chamber to be heard in arrest of judgment. The Bishop of Rochester's attendance was dispensed with on the ground of illness, and because he had made his defence in writing.1 Nothing of consequence was urged by either of the accused. The bill was most explicit in its details, going carefully through the history of the imposture, and dwe.ling on the separate acts of each offender. They were able to disprove no one of its clauses, and on the 12th of March it was read a last time. On the 21st it received the royal assent, and there remained only to execute the The Numeral sentence. The Nun herself, Richard Mashe executed. ters, and the five friars being found guilty of high treason, were to die; the Bishop of of Rochester and father Abel to be Rochester, Father Abel, Queen Catherine's im priso and with forconfessor, and four more, were sentenced for folton of misprision of treason to forfeiture of goods and gooda. imprisonment. All other persons implicated, whose names did not appear, were declared pardoned at the

of April, meeting death calmly, as it appears; receiving a fate most necessary and most deserved, yet claiming from us that partial respect which is due to all persons who will risk their lives in an un-

intercession of Queen Anne.2

¹ Lords' Journals, p. 73.
* 20 Hon. VIII. cap. 13.

In a tract written by a Dr. Maryson in defence of the government, three years later, I find evidence that a distinction was made among the prisoners, and that Dr. Booking was executed with peculiar cruelty. "Solut in crucem actus set Bockingus," are Maryson's words, though I feel uncertain of the nature of the punishment which he meant to designate. "Crucifixion" was unknown to the English law; and an event so peculiar as the "crucifixion" of a mank would hardly have escaped the notice of the contemporary chroniclers. In a careful diary kept by a London merchant during these years, which is in MS, in the Library of Balliol College, Oxland, the whole party are said to have been hanged. — See, however, Marysons Apomorais, winted by Berthelet, 1537.

selfish cause. For the Nun herself, we may feel even a less qualified regret. Before her death she was permitted to speak a few words to the people, which at the distance of three centuries will not be read without emotion.

"Hither am I come to die," she said, "and I have not been the only cause of mine own death, Last words which most justly I have deserved; but also of the Num I am the cause of the death of all these persons which at this time here suffer. And yet I am not so much to be blamed, considering that it was well known unto these learned men that I was a poor wench without learning; and therefore they might have easily percaived that the things which were done by me could not proceed in no such sort; but their capacities and learning could right well judge that they were altogether feigned. But because the things which I feigned were profitable unto them, therefore they much praised me, and bare me in hand that it was the Holy Ghost and not I that did them. And I being puffed up with their praises, fell into a pride and foolish fantasye with myself, and thought I might feign what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case, and for the which I now cry God and the King's Highness most heartily mercy, and desire all you good people to pray to God to have mercy on me, and on all them that here suffer with me." 1

The inferior confederates were committed to their prisons with the exception only of Fisher, in who, though sentenced, found mercy thrust east, a left upon him, till by fresh provocation the miser-impunished.

Ball, p. 814

Lord Harbert says he was pardoned, I do not find, however, on what

And now the closing seal was to be affixed to the agitation of the great question of the preced-The Art of Succession. ing years. I have said that throughout these years the uncertainty of the succession had been the continual anxiety of the nation. The birth pity of It. of a prince or princess could alone provide an absolute security; and to beget a prince appeared to be the single feat which Henry was unable to accomplish. The marriage so dearly bought had been followed as yet only by a girl; and if the king were to die, leaving two daughters circumstanced as Mary and Elizabeth were circumstanced, a dispute would open which the sword only could decide. escape the certainty of civil war, therefore, it was necessary to lay down the line of inheritance by a peremptory order; to cut off resolutely all rival claims; and, in legislating upon a matter so vital, and nitherto so uncertain and indeterminate, to enforce the decision with the most stringent and exacting penalties. the Heptarchy downwards English history furnished no fixed rule of inheritance, but only a series of precedents of uncertainty; and while at no previous time had the circumstances of the succession been of a nature so legitimately embarrassing, the relations of England with the pope and with foreign powers doubly enhanced the danger. But I will not use my own language on so important a subject. The preamble of the Act of Succession is the best interpreter of the provisions of that act.

"In their most humble wise show unto your Majesty your most humble and obedient subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons, in this anthority: but he was certainly not imprisoned, nor was the scatence of forfesture enforced against him.

present parliament assembled; that since it is the natural inclination of every man gladly and will- Townset w ingly to provide for the safety of both his quantificant title and succession, although it touch only three les his private cause; we therefore, most right- and in his ful and dreadful Sovereign Lord, reckon ourselves much more bounden to beseech and intreat your Highness (although we doubt not of your princely heart and wisdom, mixed with a natural affection to the same) to foresee and provide for the most perfect surety of both you and of your most lawful successors and heirs, upon which dependeth all our joy and wealth; in whom also is united and knit the only mere true inheritance and title of this realm without any contradiction. We, your said most hamble and and land obedient servants, call to our remembrance was put a the great divisions which in times past hath disputed been in this realm by reason of several titles eventions pretended to the imperial crown of the same; tuesd conwhich some time and for the most part ensued workin, by occasion of ambiguity, and [by] doubts then not so perfectly declared but that men might upon froward intents expound them to every man's sinister appetite and affection after their senses; whereof hath ensued great destruction and effusion of man's blood, as well of a great number of the nobles as of other the subjects and specially inheritors in the same. The Beaute there had greatest occasion thereof hath been because fixed erder no perfect and substantial provision by law hath been made within this realm itself when bentance, doubts and questions have been moved; by reason whereof the Bishops of Rome and See Apostolic have presumed in times past to invest who should please them to inherit in other men's kingdoms and dominions.

which thing we your most humble subjects, both spiritnal and temporal, do much abhor and detest.

And because the latricuse of the popes sign princes have created mulition and eonfution, sometimes other foreign princes and potentates of sundry degrees, minding rather dissension and discord to continue in the realm than charity, equity, or unity, have many times supported wrong titles, whereby they might the more easily and facility aspire to the superiority of the same.

The king!a au blecta intreat his Righteen for their batter EDC UT IBY miter ble denth, that It may be suneted by anthority of parliament :

"The continuance and sufferance of these things, deeply considered and pondered, is too dangerous and perilous to be suffered any longer; and too much contrary to unity, peace, and tranquillity, being greatly reproachable and dishonourable to the whole realm. consideration thereof, your said subjects, calling further to their remembrance, that the good unity, peace, and wealth of the realm, specially and principally, above all worldly things, consisteth in the surety and certainty of the procreation and posterity of your Highness, in whose most Royal person at this time is no manner of doubt, do therefore most humbly beseech your Highness that it may be enacted, with

"1. That the marriage between your Highness and the Lady Catherine, widow of the late Prince 1. That the marriage Arthur, be declared to have been from the with the Eady Cathbeginning, null, the issue of it illegitimate, erine was inwalld from and the separation pronounced by the Archthe beginalog. bishop of Canterbury good and valid.

the consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons in this present parliament assembled —

4 2. That the marriage between your Highness and your most dear and entirely beloved wife, 1 That the BATHE Queen Anne, be established and held good. Title Gump and taken for undoubtful, true, sincere, and Annote good perfect, ever hereafter." 1

The act then assumed a general character, laying down a table of prohibited degrees, within That the which marriage might not under any pretence tion of the be in future contracted; and demanding that Queen Anne any marriage which might already exist . within those degrees should be at once dissolved. After this provision, it again returned to the king, and fixed the order in which his children by Queen Anna were to succeed. The details of the regulations were minute and elaborate, and the rule to be observed was the same as that which exists at present. First, the sons were to succeed with their heirs; if sons failed, then the daughters, with their heirs. And, in conclusion, it was resolved, that any person who And that ahould maliciously do anything by writing, whoever hy printing, or other external act or deed to the injurned peril of the king, or to the prejudice of his marriage with Queen Anne, or to the derogation of the issue of that marriage, should be busen. held guilty of high treason; and whoever should speak against that marriage, should be held guilty of misprision of treason; -severe enactments, such as could not be justified at ordinary times, and such as, if the times had been ordinary, would not have been thought necessary; but the exigencies of the country could not tolerate an uncertainty of title in the heir to the crown; and the title could only be secured by prohibiting sholutely the discussion of dangerous questions.

The mere enactment of a statute, whatever penalties were attached to the violation of it, was still, however, an insufficient safeguard. The recent investigation had revealed a spirit of disloyalty, where such a spirit had not been expected. The deeper the inquiry had penetrated, the more clearly appeared tokens, if not of conspiracy, yet of excitement, of doubt, of agitation, of alienated feeling, if not of alienated act. All the symptoms were abroad which provide disaffection with its opportunity; and in the natural confusion which attended the revolt from the papacy, the obligations of duty, both political and religious, had become indefinite and contradictory, pointing in all directions, like the magnetic needle in a thunderstorm.

^{*}This is the substance of the provisions which are, of course, tauch shridged.

It was thought well, therefore, to vest a power in the crown, of trying the tempers of sus-All persons, at the king's pected persons, and examining them upon pleasure, liable to be oath, as to their willingness to maintain the galled upon decision of parliament. This measure was a natural corollary of the statute, and depended for its justification on the extent of the danger to which the state was exposed. If a difference of opinion on the legitimacy of the king's children, or of the pope's power in England, was not dangerous, it was unjust to interfere with the natural liberty of speech or thought. If it was dangerous, and if the state had cause for supposing that opinions of the kind might spread in secret so long as no opportunity was offered for detecting their progress, to require the oath was measure of reasonable self-defence, not permissible only, but in a high degree necessary and right.

Under the impression, then, that the circumstances of the country demanded extraordinary prection appoint cautions, a commission was appointed, consisting of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, and the Duke of Suffolk; and these four, or any three of them, were empowered to administer, at the pleasure of the king, "to all and singular liege subjects of the realm," the following oath: —

"Ye shall swear to bear your faith, truth, and obedience only to the King's Majesty, and to the March M. Terms of the heirs of his body, according to the limitation outs to the and rehearsal within the statute of succession; and not to any other within this realm, or foreign authority, prince, or potentate: and in case any oath be made or hath been made by you to any other person or persons, that then you do repute the same as vain and annihilate: and that to your cunning, wit, and utmost of your power, without guile, fraud, or other undue means, ve shall observe, keep, maintain, and defend this act above specified, and all the whole contents and effects thereof; and all other acts and statutes made since the beginning of this present parliament, in confirmation or for due execution of the same, or of anything therein contained. And thus ye shall do against all manner of persons, of what estate, dignity, degree, or condition soever they be; and in no wise do or attempt, or to your power suffer to be done or attempted, directly or indirectly, any thing or things, privily or apertly, to the let, hindrance, damage, or derogation thereof, by any manner of means, or for any pretence or cause, so help you God and all sainta."1

^{*} Lords' Journals, Vol. I. p. 82. An act was also passed in this session against the usurped power of the Bishop of Rome." We trace it is is progress through the House of Lords. (Lords' Journals, Parlament of 1533-84.) It received the royal assent (thid), and is subsequently alluded to in the 16th of the 28th of Henry VIII., as well as in a Royal Proclamation dated June, 1534, and yet it is not on the Roll, nor do I anywhere find traces of it. It is not to be confounded with the act against payment of Peter's Pence, for in the Lords' Journals the two acts are separately mentioned. It received the royal assent or the 30th of March, while that

With this last resolution the House rose, having sat seventy-five days, and despatched their business swiftly.

A week later, the news arrived from Rome that there too all was at length over; that the pere had the cause was decided, and decided against the liver see king. The history of the closing catastrophe is as obscure as it is strange, and the account of the manner in which it was brought about is unfortunately incomplete in many important particulars. The outline only can be apprehended, and that very imperfectly.

On the receipt in Paris of the letter in which Henry threatened to organize a Protestant confed-Mission of the Stahop eracy, Du Bellay, in genuine anxiety for the of Paris to welfare of Christendom, had volunteered his services for a final effort. Not a moment was to be lost, for the courts at Rome were already busy with the great cause; but the king's evident reluctance to break with the Catholic powers gave room for hope that something might still be done; and going in person to England, the bishop had induced Henry, at the last extremity, either to entrust him with representative powers, or else to allow him after all to make some kind of concession. I am unable to learn the extent to which Henry yielded, but that an offer was made of some kind is evident from the form of the story.1 against Peter's Peace was suspended till the 7th of April. It contained, also, an indirect assertion that the king was Head of the English Church, according to the title which had been given him by Convocation. (King's Proclamation: Foxe, Vol. V p. 69.) For some cause or other, the act at the last moment must have been withdrawn.

¹ See Burnet, Vol. I. pp. 220, 221: Vol. III. p. 135; and Lord Herbert. Du Bellay's brother, the author of the memours, says that the king, at the bishop's entresty, prumised that if the pope would delay centence, and send "judges to hear the matter, he would himself forbear to do what he proposed to do," — that is, separate wholly from the See of Rome. If this is

The winter was very cold, but the bishop made his way to Rome with the haste of good will, and arrived in time to stay judgment, which was on the point of being pronounced. It seemed, for the moment, as if he would succeed. He was permitted to At Sect, with make engagements on the part of Henry; simeous and that time might be allowed for communication with England, the pope agreed to delay sentence till the 23d of March. The bishop's terms The bishop were approved by the king, and a courier of which was sent off with letters of confirmation; Sir stores, and Edward Kame and Dr. Revett following a courier with his comleisurely, with a more ample commission. The stone which had been laboriously rolled to the summit of the hill was trembling on the brink, and in a moment might rebound into the plain.

But this was not to be the end. Some accidental cause delayed the courier; the 23d of March The courier in delays on the road. Du Bellay implored a further respite. The King of the concleve implored a further respite. The King of the delays implored; a majority tended, he said, had waited six years; it against the was not a great thing for the papal council to the said against the wait six days. The cardinals were divided; prosourced but the Spanish party were the strongest, and when the votes were taken carried the day. The die was cast, and the pope, in spite of himself, his promises, and his conscience, drove at length upon the rocks to which he had been so long drifting. In deference to the opinion of the majority of the cardinals, he pronounced the original marriage to have been valid, the true, the sending "judges" must allude to the "minding them to Cambray," which had been proposed at Mameilles.

See the letter of the Bishop of Bayonne, dated March 93, in Legman.
4 perspheres in given by Burnet, Vol. III. p. 182.

dispensation by which it was permitted to have been been been legal; and, as a natural consequence, Henry, king of England, should be fail in obedience to this judgment, was declared to be excommunicate from the fellowship of the church, and to have forfeited the allegiance of his subjects.

Lest the censures should be discredited by a blank the Imperiod discharge, engagements were entered into, that within four months of the promulgation of the sentence, the emperor would invade England, and Henry should be deposed. The imperialists illuminated Rome; cannon were fired; bonfires blazed; and great bodies of men paraded the streets with shouts of "the Empire and Spain." Already, in their eager expectation, England was a second Netherlands, a captured province under the regency of Catherine or Mary.

Two days later, the courier arrived. The pope, at the entreaties of the Bishop of Paris, reassembled the consistory, to consider whether the steps which had been taken should be undone. They sat debating all night, and the result was nothing. No dependence could be placed on the cardinals, Du Bellay said, for they spoke one way, and voted another.

Thus all was over. In a scene of general helplessness the long drama closed, and, what we call accident, for want of some better word, cut the knot at last over which human incapacity had so vainly laboured. The Bishop of Paris retired from Rome in despair. On his way back, he met the English commissioners at

¹ Promisistis predecessori meo qued el sententiam contra regem Anglia tulimet, Casar illum infra quatuor menses erat invasuras, et regue expulsarus. — Biate Papers, Vol. VII. p. 579.

Letter of Du Bellay in Legrand.

[•] Ibid.

Bologna, and told them that their errand was hopeless, and that they need not proceed. "When we asked him," wrote Sir Edward Karne to the king, "the cause of such hasty process, by the span he made answer that the imperialists at Rome had strengthened themselves in such a manner, that they coacted the said Bishop of Rome to give sentence contrary to his own mind, and the expectation of himself and of the French king. He showed us also that the Lady Princess Dowager sent lately, in the month of March past, letters to the Bishop of Rome, and also to her proctors, whereby the Bishop of Rome was much moved for her part. The imperials, before the sentence was given, promised, in the emperor's behalf, that he would be the executor of the sentence."

This is all which we are able to say of the immediate catastrophe which decided the fate of England, and through England, of the world. The deep impenetrable falsehood of the Roman ecclesiastics prevents us from discovering with what intentions the game of the last few weeks or months had been played; it is sufficient for Englishmen to remember, that, whatever may have been the explanation of his conduct, the pope, in the concluding passage of his connexion with this country, furnished the most signal justification which was ever given for the revolt from an abused authority. The supreme judge in Christendom had for six years trifled with justice, out of fear of an earthly prince; he concluded these years with uniting the extreme of folly with the extreme of improbity, and pronounced a centence, willingly or unwillingly, which he had acknowledged to be unjust.

Bir Edward Kerns and Dr. Revett to Henry VIII.r State Papers, Vol. pp. 553, 554.

Charity may possibly acquit Clement of conscious duplicity. He was one of those men who Papel diwaited upon fortune, and waited always without success; who gave his word as the interest of the moment suggested, trusting that it might be convenient to observe it; and who was too long accustomed to break his promises to look with any particular alarm on that contingency. It is possible, also, - for of this Clement was capable, - that he knew from the beginning the conclusion to which he would at last be driven; that he had engaged himself with Charles to decide in Catherine's favour as distinctly as he had engaged himself with Francis to decide against her; and that all his tortuous scheming was intended either to weary out the patience of the King of England, or to entangle him in acknowledgments from which he would not be able to extricate himself.

He was mistaken, certainly, in the temper of the Chement had English nation; he believed what the friars told him; and trusting to the promises of disusietaken. Begues affection, insurrection, invasion — those ignes fatui which for sixty years floated so delusively before the Italian imagination, he imagined, perhaps, that he might trifle with Henry with impunity. This only is impossible, that, if he had seriously intended to fulfil the promises which he had made to the French king, the accidental delay of a courier could have made so large a difference in his determination. It is not possible that, if he had assured him But his true Inter tiens self, as he pretended, that justice was on the side against which he had declared, he would not have availed himself of any pretext to retreat from a position which ought to have been intolerable to him.

The question, however, had ended, "as all things in The news of Property this world do have their end." the sentence arrived in England at the begin-ning of April, with an intimation of the engagements which had been entered upon by the imperial ambassador for an invasion. Du Bellay returned to Paris at the same time, to report the failure of his undertaking; and Francis, disappointed, angry, and alarmed, sent the Duke of Guise to London with promises of support if an attempt to invade was really made, and with a warning at the same time to Henry to prepare for danger. Troops were gathering in Preparation for Vanders Flanders; detachments were on their way for an invadent cut of Italy, Germany, and Bohemia, to be followed by three thousand Spaniards, and perhaps many more; and the object avowed for these preparations was wholly incommensurate with their magnitude.1 For his own sake, Francis could not permit a successful invasion of England, unless, indeed, he himself was to take part in it; and therefore, with entire sincerity, he offered his services. The cordial understanding for which Henry had hoped was at an end; but the political confederacy remained, which the interests of the two countries combined for the present to preserve unbroken.

Guise proposed another interview at Calais between the sovereigns. The king for the moment Proposal for was afraid to leave England, lest the oppor- for between

¹ State Popers, Vol. VII. p. 860, at seq.

His Highsess, considering the time and the malice of the emperous, cannot conveniently pass out of the realm - since he leaveth behind him another daughter and a mother, with their friends, maligning his enterprises in this behalf — who bearing no amall grudge against his most entirely beloved Queen Anne, and his young daughter the princess, might perchance in his absence take occasion to excognate and practice with their tunity should be made use of for an insurrection; but prudence taught him, though disappointed Which Henry is afraid to in Francis, to make the best of a connexion accept, inti too convenient to be sacrificed. The Gerthere should he a vising to his absence. man league was left in abeyance till the immediate danger was passed, and till the effect of the shock in England itself had been first experienced. He gladly accepted, in lieu of it, an offer that The French met guard the French fleet should guard the Channel through the summer; and meanwhile, he collected himself resolutely to abide the issue, whatever the issue was to be.

The Tudor spirit was at length awake in the Engmonormo lish sovereign. He had exhausted the rempon Henry sources of patience; he had stooped even to indignity to avoid the conclusion which had come at last. There was nothing left but to meet defiance by defiance, and accept the position to which the pope had driven him In quiet times occasionally wayward and capricious, Henry, like Elizabeth after him, reserved his noblest nature for the moments of danger, and was ever greatest when peril was most immediate. Woe to those who crossed him now, for the time was grown stern, and to trifle further was to le lost. suspended act of parliament was made law on the day (it would seem) of the arrival of the sen-April 7. Convocation tence. Convocation, which was still sitting, declared the pape'e auhurried through a declaration that the pope thority abol Johnd. had no more power in England than any other bishop. Five years before, if a heretic had ventured so desperate an opinion, the clergy would have mid friends matters of no small peril to his royal person, realm, and reljects. — State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 509. tended with each other in precipitate obsequiousness. The houses of the Observants at Canterbury and Greenwich, which had been implicated with the Nun of Kent, were suppressed, and the brethren were scattered among monasteries where they could be under surveillance. The Nun and her friends were sent to execution. The ordnance stores were examined, the repairs of the navy were hastened, and the The participants of the navy were hastened, and the The participants of the navy were along the coast. Strangtheost along the coast. Strangtheost along the coast. Strangtheost along the coast. Strangtheost along the coast.

The commission appointed under the Statute of Succession opened its sittings to receive the caths The commisof allegiance. Now, more than ever, was it receive the outbus of alnecessary to try men's dispositions, when the legunous pope had challenged their obedience. In words all went well: the peers swore; bishops, abbots, priors, heads of colleges, swore a with scarcely an exception, the nation seemed to unite in an unanimous declaration of freedom. In one quarter only, and that a very painful one, was there refusal. It was found solely among the persons who had been implicated in the late conspiracy. Neither Sir Thomas More nor the Bishop of Rochester could expect that their recent conduct would exempt them from an obligation which the people generally accepted with good will. They had connected themselves, perhaps unintentionally, with a body

15

I mentioned their execution in connexion with their sentence; but it did not take place till the 20th of April, a month after their attainder: and delay of this kind was very unusual in cases of high treason. I have little doubt that their final sentence was in fact pronounced by the pope.

The oath 1 of a great many are in Rymer, Vol. VI. part 2, p. 195, et seq.

of confessed traitors. An opportunity was offered them of giving evidence of their loyalty, and escaping from the shadow of distrust. More had been treated leniently; Fisher had been treated far more than leniently. It was both fair and natural that they should be called upon to give proof that their lesson had not been learnt in vain; and, in fact, no other persons, if they had been passed over, could have been called upon to swear, for no other persons had laid themselves open to so just suspicion.

Their conduct so exactly tallied, that they must have agreed beforehand on the course which they would adopt; and in following the details, we need concern ourselves only with the nobler figure.

The commissioners sate at the archbishop's palace at Lambeth; and at the end of April, Sir Thomas More received a summons to appear before them. He was at his house at Chelsea, where for the last two years he had hved in deep retirement, making ready for evil times. Those times at length were come. On the morning on which he was to present himself, he matches confessed and received the sacrament in Chelsea church; and "whereas," says his great-grandson, "at other times, before he parted from his wife and children, they used to bring him to his boat, and he there kissing them bade them farewell, at this time he suffered none of them to follow him forth of his gate, but pulled the wicket after him, and with

I His great-grandson's history of him (Life of Ser Thomas More, by Creasers More, written about 1620, published 1637, with a dedication to Hearietta Maria) is incorrect in so many instances that I follow it with best-tation; but the account of the present matter is derived from Mr. Reper, More's son-in-law, who accompanied him to Lambeth, and it is incidentally confirmed in various details by More himself.

a heavy heart he took boat with his son Roper." 1 He was leaving his home for the last time, and April 15. he knew it. He sat silent for some minutes, And goes by boot to Lamand then, with a sudden start, said, "I thank both. our Lord, the field is won." Lambeth Palace was crowded with people who had come on the same errand with himself. More was called in early, and found Dromwell present with the four commissioners, and also the Abbot of Westminster. The oath The cath in was read to him. It implied that he should and he me keep the statute of succession in all its parts, from X. and he desired to see the statute itself. He read it through, and at once replied that others might do as they pleased; he would blame no one for taking the eath; but for himself it was impossible. He would swear willingly to the part of it which secured the succession to the children of Queen Anne.2 That was a matter on which parliament was competent to decide, and he had no right to make objections. If he might be allowed to take an eath to this portion of the statute in language of his own, he would do it; but as the words stood, he would " peril his soul" by using them. The Lord Chancellor desired him to reconsider his answer. He retired to the garden, and in He is destroit his absence others were called in; among monalder them the Bishop of Rochester, who refused bis answer. in the same terms. More was then recalled. suple, and He was asked if he persisted in his resolu- nor again tion; and when he replied that he did, he refuse. was requested to state his reasons. He said that he was afraid of increasing the king's displeasure, but if he could be assured that he might explain himself safely, he was ready to do so. If his objection could then be answered to his satisfaction, he would swear; in the meantime, he repeated, very explicitly, that he judged no one — he spoke only for himself

' More's Life of More, p. 232.

More held extreme republican epinions on the textre of kings, holding at they might be deposed by not of parliamer to

An opening seemed to be offered in these expressions which was caught at by Cranmer's kindthe to conthe taking the cath, the archbishop said, Sir Thomas More could not be sure that it was sin to take it; while his duty to his king and to the parliament was open and unquestioned.

ered his firmness. He had considered what he ought to do, he said; his conscience was clear about it, and he could say no more than he had said already. They continued to argue with him, but without effect; he had made up his mind; the victory, as he said, had been won.

Cromwell was deeply affected. In his passionate regret, he exclaimed, that he had rather his only son had lost his head than that More should have refused the cath. No one knew better than Cromwell that intercession would be of no further use; that he could not himself a mise the king to give way. The parliament, after grave consideration, had passed a law which they held necessary to secure the peace of the country; and two persons of high rank refused obedience to it, whose example would tell in every English household. Either, therefore, the act was not worth the parchment on which it was written, or the penalties of it must be enforced: no middle way, no compromise, no acquiescent reservations, could in such a case be admitted. The law must have its way.

The recusants were committed for four days to the keeping of the Abbot of Westminster; and Mero, with the council met to determine on the course to committee to be pursued. Their offence, by the act, was of the Abbet misprision of treason. On the other hand, of Wastella they had both offered to acknowledge the Princess Elizabeth as the lawful heir to the throne; and the question was raised whether this offer should be accepted. It was equivalent to a demand that prove to the form should be altered, not for them only, the Council. but for every man. If persons of their rank and notoriety were permitted to swear with a qualification, the same privilege must be conceded to all. But there was so much anxiety to avoid extremities, and so warm a regard was personally felt for Sir Thomas More, that this objection was not allowed to be fatal. It was thought that possibly an exception might be made, yet kept a secret from the world; and the fact that they had sworn under any form might go far to silence objectors and reconcile the better class of the disaffected.1 This view was particularly urged by Cran- Orange mer, always gentle, hoping, and illogical. they may But, in fact, secresy was impossible. More's discretion could have been relied upon, Fisher's babbling tongue would have trumpeted his victory to all the winds. Nor would the government consent to pass censure on its own conduct by evading the question whether the act was or was not just. If it was not just, it ought not to be maintained at all, if it was just, there must be no respect of per-declared illegal the marriage of the king with Catherine, and the marriage legal between the king and Queen Anne. To refuse these was to declare Mary legitimate, to declare Elizabeth illegitimate, and would do more to strengthen Mary's claims than could be undone by a thousand oaths. However large might be More's estimate of the power of parliament, he could have given no clear answer - and far less could Fisher have given a clear answer - if they had been required to say the part which they would take, should the emperor invade the kingdom under the pope's sanction. The emperor would come to execute a sentence which in their consciences they believed to be just; how could they retain their allegiance to Henry, when their convictions must be with the invading army?

The clauses to which the bishop and the ex-chancellor declined to bind themselves were those which

¹ More's Life of More, p. 237.

Barnet, Vol. I. p. 265.

What ought to have been done let those say who disapprove of what was actually done. The high character of the prisoners, while it increased the desire, increased the difficulty of sparing them; and to have given way would have been a confession of a doubtful cause, which at such a time would not have been dangerous, but would have been fatal. Anne Boleyn is said to have urged the king to remain per-Cromwell asplains to Cranmer emptory; 1 but the following letter of Cromthat conceswell's explains the ultimate resolution of the etou la imcouncil in a very reasonable manner. It was written to Cranmer, in reply to his arguments for concession.

"My Lord, after mine humble commendation, it may please your Grace to be advertised that I have received your letter, and showed the same to the King's Highness; who, perceiving that your mind and opinion is, that it were good that the Bishop of Rochester and Master More should be sworn to the act of the king's succession, and not to the preamble of the same, thinketh that if their oaths should be taken, it were an occasion to all men to refuse the whole, or at least the like. For, in case they be sworn to the sucression, and not to the preamble, it is to be thought that it might be taken not only as a confirmation of the Bishop of Rome's authority, but also as a reprobation of the king's second marriage. Wherefore, to the intent that no such things should be brought into the heads of the people, by the example of the said Bishop of Rochester and Master More, the King's Highness in no wise willeth but that they shall be sworn as well to the presimble as to the act. Wherefore his Grace specially trusteth that ye will And begs that he will in no wise attempt to move him to the contrary; for as his Grace supposeth, that manner of swearing, if it shall be suffered, may be an utter destruction to his whole cause, and also to the effect of the law made for the same." 1

1 More's Life of More, p. 237.

Thus, therefore, with much regret the council decided—and, in fact, why should they have decided otherwise? They were satisfied that they were right in requiring the eath; and their duty to the English nation obliged them to persevere. They must go their way; and those who thought them wrong must go theirs; and the great God would judge between them. It was a hard thing to suffer for an opinion; but there are times when opinions are as dangerous as acts; and liberty of conscience was a plea which could be urged with a bad grace for men who, while in power, had fed the stake with heretics. They were summoned for returned before; and nothing remained but to pronounce against them the penalties of the statute, imprisonment at the king's pleasure, and forfeiture. The latter part of the sentence was not enforced. More's family were left in the enjoyment of his property. Fisher's bishoprick was not taken from him. They were sent to the Tower, where for the present we leave them.

⁴ Cromwell to the Archbishop of Canterbury: Rolls House MS

Meanwhile, in accordance with the resolution taken in council on the 2d of December, but which Directions to the clergy se explain in seems to have been suspended till the issue that churches the of the trial at Rome was decided, the bishops. ehanger who had been examined severally on the nawhich had ture of the papal authority, and whose answers had been embodied in the last act of parliament, were now required to instruct the clergy throughout their dioceses — and the elergy in turn to instruct the people - in the nature of the changes which had taken place. A bishop was to preach each Sunday at Paul's Cross, on the pope's usurpation. Every secular priest was directed to preach on the same subject week after week, in his parish church. Abbots and priors were Moblemen. to teach their convents; noblemen and genmen where their families and servants; mayors their perand aldermen the boroughs. In town and country, in all houses, at all dinner-tables, the conduct of the pope and the causes of the separation from Rome were to be the one subject of conversation; that the whole nation might be informed accurately and faithfully of the grounds on which the government had acted. No wiser method could have been adopted The imperial agents would be busy under the surface.

1 State Papers, Vol. I. p. 411, et seq.

1534.]

and the mendicant friers, and all the missionaries of insurrection. The machinery of order was set in force to counteract the machinery of sedition.

Further, every bishop, in addition to the oath of allegiance, had sworn obedience to the king Bebook as Supreme Head of the Church; and this king as West to the was the title under which he was to be spoken Church, and of in all churches of the realm. A royal order had been issued, "that all manner of Mess books. prayers, rubrics, canons of Mass books, and all other books in the churches wherein the Bishop of Rome was named, or his presumptuous and proud pomp and authority preferred, should utterly be abolished, eradicated, and rased out, and his name and memory should be never more, except to his contumely and reproach, remembered; but perpetually be suppressed and obscured." 3

Nor were these mere idle sounds, like the bellow of unshotted cannon; but words with a sharp, prompt meaning, which the king intended to be obeyed. He had addressed his orders to the clergy, because the clergy were the officials who had possession of the pulpits from which the people were to be taught; but he knew their nature too well to trust them. They were too well schooled in the tricks of reservation; and, for the nonce, it was necessary to reverse the posture of the priest and of his flock, and to set the honest laymen to overlook their pastors.

With the instructions to the bishops circulars went round to the sheriffs of the counties, contain- June 9. Circular or ing a full account of these instructions, and deradate ed to the an appeal to their loyalty to see that the royal shorting to see that the orders were obeyed. "We," the king wrote that the charge do that date to them, " seeing, esteeming, and reputing you to be of such singular and vehement zeal and affection towards the glory of Almighty God, and of so faithful, loving, and obedient heart towards us, as you will accomplish, with all power, diligence, and labour, whatsoever shall be to the preferment and setting forth of God's word, have thought good, not only to signify anto you by these our letters, the particulars of the charge given by us to the bishops, but also to require and straitly charge you, upon pain of your allegiance, and as ye shall avoid our high indignation and displeasure, [that] at your uttermost peril, laying aside all vain affections, respects, and other carnal considerations, and setting only before your eyes the mirrour of the truth, the glory of God, the dignity of your Sovereign Lord and King, and the great concord and unity, and inestimable profit and utility, that shall by the due execution of the premises ensue to yourselves and to all other faithful and loving subjects, ye make or cause to be made diligent search and wait, whether the said bishops do truly and sincerely, without all manner of cloke, colour, or dissimulation, execute and accomplish our will and commandment, as is aforesaid. Tribey bear case ye shall hear that the said bishops, or of any slack any other ecclesiastical person, do omit and are to report leave undone any part or parcel of the premises, or else in the execution and setting forth of the same, do coldly and feignedly use any manner of sinister addition, wrong interpretation, or painted colour, then we straitly charge and command you that you do make, undelayedly, and with all speed and diligence, declaration and advertisement to us and to our wouncil of the said default.

Boyal Proclamation, June, 1584

"And foresmuch as we upon the singular trust which we have in you, and for the special love which we suppose you bear towards us, and the weal and tranquillity of this our realm, bave specially elected and chosen you among so many for this purpose, and have reputed you such men as unto whose wisdom and fidelity we might commit a matter of such great weight and importance: if ye should, contrary to And if they our expectation and trust which we have with the in you, and against your duty and allegiance the constitution which towards us, neglect, or omit to do with all the king has placed in them, power for the due performance of our pleasure to you declared, or halt or stumble at any part or specialty of the same; Be ye assured that we, like a prince Be will make of justice, will so extremely punish you for supla to all the same, that all the world beside shall take by you example, and beware contrary to their allegiance to disobey the lawful commandment of their Sovereign Lord and Prince.

"Given under our signet, at our Palace of Westminster, the 9th day of June, 1534." ¹

So Henry spoke at last. There was no place any more for nice distinctions and care of tender consciences. The general, when the shot is flying, cannot qualify his orders with dainty periods. Swift command and swift obedience can alone be tolerated; and martial law for those who hesitate.

This chapter has brought many things to a close. Before ending it we will leap over three months, to the termination of the career of the pope who has been so far our companion. Not any more was the distracted Clement to wist his handkerchief, or weep, or flatter or wildly wave his arms in angry impotence, he was beath of to lie down in his long rest, and vex the world no more. He had lived to set England free—an exploit which, in the face of so persevering an anxiety to escape a separation, required a rare genius and a combination of singular qualities. He had finished his work, and now he was allowed to depart.

Foxe, Vol. V. p. 70.

In him, infinite insincerity was accompanied with a grace of manner which regained confidence as rapidly as it was forfeited. Desiring sincerely, so far as he could be sincere in anything, to please every one by turns, and reckless of truth to a degree in which he was without a rival in the world, he sought only to escape his difficulties by inactivity, and he trusted to provide himself with a refuge against all contingencies by waiting upon time. Even when at length he was compelled to act, and to act in a distinct direction, his plausibility long enabled him to explain away his conduct; and, honest in the excess of his dishonesty, he wore his falsehood with so easy a grace that it assumed the character of truth. He was false, deceitful, treacherous; yet he had the virtue of not pretending to be virtuous. He was a real man, though but an indifferent one; and we can refuse to no one, however grave his faults, a certain ambiguous sympathy, when in his perplexities he shows us features so truly human in their weakness as those of Clem ent VII.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE IRISH REBELLION.

"THE Pander 1 sheweth, in the first chapter of his book, called Salus Populi, that the hely woman, Brigitta, used to inquire of her good angel many questions of secrets divine; and among all other she inquired, 'Of what Christian land was most souls damned?' The angel shewed her a land in The vision of the Ho.y the west part of the world. She inquired the Brights cause why? The angel said, for there is most continual war, root of hate and envy, and of vices contrary to charity; and without charity the souls cannot be saved. And the angel did shew to her the lapse of the souls of Christian folk of that land, how they fell down into hell, as thick as any hail showers. And pity thereof moved the Pander to conceive his said book, as in the said chapter plainly doth appear; for after his opinion, this [Ireland] is the land that the angel under stood; for there is no land in this world of so continual war within itself; ne of so great shedding of Christian blood; ne of so great robbing, spoiling, preying, and burning; ne of so great wrongful extortion continually, as Ireland. Wherefore it cannot be denied by very estimation of man but that the angel did understand the land of Ireland." 1

¹ "Panderus, or the author of a book, De Salute Populi, flourished in the raigns of Edward IV., Edward V., Richard III., and Henry VII.; perhaps who in the raign of Henry VIII.'—Sir James Ware, Writers of Ireland p. 90.

Nine hundred years had passed away since the vision of the Holy Brigitta, and four hundred since the custody of the unfortunate country had been undertaken by the most orderly nation in the world; yet, at the close of all those centuries, "it could not be denied by very estimation of man" that poor Irish souls were still descending, thick as hail showers, into the general abyss of worthlessness. The Pander's satire upon the English enterprise was a heavy one.

When the wave of the Norman invasion first rolled across St. George's Channel, the success was Bapid memeas of the as easy and appeared as complete as William's conquest of the Saxons. There was of Irehand. no unity of purpose among the Irish chieftains, no national spirit which could support a sustained resistance. The country was open and unde-The chargefended,2 and after a few feeble struggles the wountry. contest ceased. Ireland is a basin, the centre a fertile undulating plain, the edges a fringe of mountains that form an almost unbroken coast line. Into these highlands the Irish tribes were driven, where they were allowed to retain a partial independence, under condition of paying tribute; the Norman immi-The settlethent of it grants dividing among themselves the ingrider the Norman heritance of the dispossessed inhabitants. lendors.

If State of Ireland, and plan for its reformation, 1515: State Papers, Vol. 11, p. 11.

^{*} Bouse men have the opinion that this land is harder to be reformed now than it was to be conquered at the first Conquest; considering that Irishmen have more hardiness and policy and was, and more arms and artillery than they had at the Conquest. At that time there was not in all Ireland, out of cities, five Castles no Piles, and now there be tive hundred Castles and Piles. — Baron Finglas's Breviate of Ireland, written circa 1535 Harris's Bibernica, p. 88.

In every of the said five portions, Ulster, Connaught, Leinnier, South

Strongbow and his companions became the feudal sovereigns of the island, holding their estates under the English crown. The common law of England was introduced; the king's writ passed current from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear; I and if the leading Norman families had remained on the estates which they had conquered, or if those who did remain had retained the character which they brought with them, the entire country would, in all likelihood, have settled down obediently, and at length willingly, under a rule which it would have been without power to resist.

An expectation so natural was defeated by two causes, alike unforeseen and perplexing. Two causes of the decition of the Roman Empire, were in search of homes; and they subdued only to colonize. The feudal system bound the noble to the lands which he possessed; and a theory of ownership of estates, as consisting merely in the receipt of rents from other occupants, was alike unheard of in fact, and repugnant to the principles of feudal society. To Ireland belongs, among absorbation its other misfortunes, the credit of having Minaster, and West Manster, that was conquered by King Henry Fitz-Empress, [there were] left under tribute certain frishmen of the principal blood of the irish nation, that were before the Conquest inhabitants within every of the said portions, as in Leinster, the Cavanaghs of the blood of Millorough, sometime king of the same; in South Manster, the Micarties, of the blood of the Carties, sometime kings of Cork; in the other pertions of Munster, west of the river Shannon (Clare), where O'Brien in, which was naver conquered in obedience to the king's laws, O'Brien and his blood have continued them still, which O'Brien gave tribute to King Henry situ-Empress, and to his heirs, by the space of one hundred years. In Connaught was left under tribute certain of the blood of O'Connor, sometime king of the same; certain of the Kellies, and others. In Ulater were left certain of the blood of O'Melaghlia, sometime king of the same; and diverse of the blood of O'Melaghlia, sometime king of the same; and diverse others of Irish nations. — Baron Finglas's Breviols. Harris, p. 68.

I Thomsend seems to have been an exception.

first given birth to absentees. The descendants of the first invaders preferred to regard their inheritance, not as a theatre of duty on which they were to reside, but as a possession which they might farm for their individual advantage. They managed their properties by agents, as sources of revenue, leasing them even among the Irash themselves; and the tenantry, deprived of the supporting presence of their lords, and governed only in a merely mercenary spirit, transferred back their allegiance to the exiled chiefs of the old race.

6 San Pinglas's Browints. 35 Hen. VL cap. 9: Irish Street Book. 30 Hen. VIII. 640. 3: Ibed. It seems in many cases to have been the number of accident, Irish lands descending to be resease who married into English families. In other instances, ferbited asteres were granted by the grown to Kaglish fevountes. The recurring roots, however, even though by unwilling absentom, was treated as a cross by Heavy VIII.; and English noblemen, to whom estates in Ireland had fallen, either by marriage or descent, on which they were enable to recide, were expected to grant each estates to other persons who were able to reside upon them, and willing-The wording of the Act of Atronton, passed in 1816, is very remarkable. " Feranguch as it is notorious and manifest that this the king's land of irehand, hare infere being inhabited, and in the ebudience and subjection mate the king a most noble progenitors, both principally grown unto ruin, dimelution, rebellion, and decay, by occasion that great dominious, lands, and possessions within the same, as well by the hing's grains as by connect inheritance and otherwise have descended to noblemen of the realist of Engiged, who having the same, demouring within the east male of Engiland taking the profits of their said lands and possessions for a secton, without provision making for any defines or keeping thereof in good. order in their absence, and by their negligence have suffered the wild Irishrio, being mortal and natural anomies to the Kinge of England, to enter and hold the same without emistancia, the conquest and winning whereof in the beginning not only cost the king's noble progenitors charges inostimable, but also those to whom the land was given, then and many years after abiding within the said land, nobly and valuantly defended the some, and kept such tranquility and good order, as the Kings of Jingland had due subjection of the inhabitants thereof, and the laws were obeyed and after the gift or descent of the inode to the parsons aforested, they and their heers absented thems-Ives out of the mid-land of Ireland, not pendering nor regarding the preservation thereof the King's Majorty that now is, intending the reformation of the said land, to foresee that the lake shall not eases hereafter, with the concest of his parliament," pronounces rustracture the estates of all absentes proprietors, and their pight and title gene.

This was one grave cause of the English failure, but serious as it was, it would not have sufficed alone to explain the full extent of the evil. Some most powerful families rooted themselves in the soil, and never forsook it; the Geraldines, of Munster and Kildare; the Butlers, of Kilkenny; the De Burghs, the Birminghams, the De Courcies, and many others. If these had been united among themselves, or had retained their allegiance to England, their influence could not have been long opposed successfully. Their several principalities would have formed separate centres of civilization; and the strong system of order would have absorbed and superseded the most obstinate resistance which could have been offered by the scattered anarchy of the Celts.

Unfortunately, the materials of good were converted into the worst instruments of evil. If an The seriod objection had been raised to the coloniza- Norman Irish to the tion of America, or to the conquest of India, making Colon. on the ground that the character of Englishmen would be too weak to contend successfully against that of the races with whom they would be brought into contact, and that they would relapse into barbarism, such an alarm would have seemed too preposterous to be entertained; yet, prior to experience, it would have been equally reasonable to expect that the modern Englishman would adopt the habits of the Hindoo or the Mohican, as that the fiery knights of Normandy would have stooped to imitate a race whom they despised as slaves; that they would have flung away their very knightly names to assume a barbarous equivelent; 1 and would so utterly have cast aside the commanding features of their Northern extraction, that their children's children could be distinguished neither in soul nor body, neither in look, in dress, in language, nor in disposition, from the Celts whom they had subdued. Such, however, was the extraordinary fact. The Irish who had been conquered in the field revenged their defeat on the minds and hearts of their conquerors; and in yielding, yielded only to fling over their new masters the subtle spell of the Celtic disposition. In vain the government attempted to Billerte of Brest to Me stem the evil. Statute was passed after statgrowing est... ute forbidding the " Englishry " of Ireland to use the Irish language, or intermarry with Irish families, or copy Irish habits.1 Penalties were multiplied on penalties; fines, forfeitures, and at last death itself, were threatened for such offences. But all in vain. The stealthy evil crept on irresistibly.2 Fresh colonists were sent over to restore the system, Reguend 651but only for themselves or their children to be swept into the stream; and from the century which succeeded the Conquest till the reign of the eighth the same appearsth by the significance of their Irish names. I likewise the M'Sweenies, now in Ulster, were recently of the Veres in England; but that they themselves, for hatred of the English, so degueed their names." Spensor a View of the State of Ireland. Be the De Burghs became Bourkes or Burkes; the Bluester Geraldines merged their family names in that of Dormond; and a younger branch of them called themselves M'Shehies.

The MacMahone in the north were anciently English, to wit, demonded from the Fitz-Uzzulas, which was a noble family in England, and You. 13.

1 Statistics of Killianny. Printed by the Irish Antiquarian Society. Planguas's Brecoute.

The phenomenon must have been observed, and the inevitable coase quence of it foreseen, very close upon the Conquest, when the observation digested itself into a prophecy. No story less than three hundred years old could easily have been reported to Baron tingles so having originated with 8t Patrick and 8t Columb. The Baron says — "The four Saints, St Patrick, St. Columb, St. Brighan, and St. Moling, many hundred years agone, made prophecy that Englishmen should conquer Iraland; and said that the said Englishmen should keep the land in prosperity as long as they should keep their own laws; and as soon as they should leave and fall to Irah order, then they should decay." — Harris, p. 88.

Henry, the strange phenomenon repeated itself, generation after generation, baffling the wisdom of statesmen, and paralysing every effort at a remedy.

Here was a difficulty which no skil, could contend against, and which was increased by the exertions which were made to oppose it. The healthy elements which were introduced to leaven the old became themmelves infected, and swelled the mass of evil; and the clearest observers were those who were most disposed to despair. Popery has been the scapegoat which, for the last three centuries, has borne the repreach of Ireland; but before popery had ceased to be the faith of the world, the problem had long presented itself in all its hopelessness. "Some say" (this is the proper of language of 1515), "and for the most part seconds. every man, that to find the antidotum for this disease is impossible — for what remedy can be had now more than hath been had unto this time? And there was never remedy found in this two hundred year that could prosper; and no medicine can be had now for this infirmity but such as hath been had afore this time. And folk were as wise that time as they be now; and since they could never find remedy, how should remedy be found by us? And the Pander maketh answer and saith, that it is no marvel that our fathers The borbs that were of more wit and wisdom than we, did never grow which could not find remedy in the premises, for the evils of the herbs did never grow. And also he saith Ireland. that the wealth and prosperity of every land is the commonwealth of the same, and not the private wealth; and all the English noble folk of this land passeth always their private weal; and in regard thereof cetteth little or nought by the common weal; insomuch as there is no common folk in all this world so little set by, so greatly despised, so feeble, so poor, so greatly trodden under foot, as the king's poor common folk be of Ireland." There was no true care for the common weal—that was the especial peculiarity by which the character higher classes in Ireland were unfortunately distinguished. In England, the last consideration of a noble-minded man was his personal advantage; Ireland was a theatre for a universal scramble of selfishness, and the invaders caught the national contagion, and became, as the phrase went, ipsis Hibernia Hiberniares.

The explanation of this disastrons phenomenon lay The outward partly in the circumstances in which they were placed, partly in the inherent tendencies the chiefs. of human nature itself. The Norman nobles antered Ireland as independent adventurers, who, each for himself, carved out his fortune with his sword; and, unsupported as they were from home, or supported only at precarious intervals, divided from one another by large tracts of country, and surrounded by Irish dependents, it was doubtless more convenient for them to govern by humouring the habits and traditions to which their vassals would most readily submit. English government, occupied with Scotland Inability of the Engilsh and France, had no leisure to maintain a powerful central authority; and a central disciplinarian rule enforced by the sword was contrary to the genius of the age. Under the feudal system, the kings governed only by the consent and with the support of the nobility; and the maintenance at Dublin of a standing military force would have been regarded with extreme suspicion in England, as well as in Ireland. Hence the affairs of both countries were.

Report on the State of Ireland, 1515: State Papers, Vol. II pp 17, 18.

for the most part, administered under the same forms, forms which were as ill suited to the waywardness of the Celt, as they met exactly the stronger nature of the At intervals, when the government was exasperated by unusual outrages, some prince of the blood was sent across as viceroy; and half a century of acquiescence in disorder would be followed by spasmodic spasmodic severity, which irritated without their adminstrated, and forfeited affection, while it failed to terrify. At all other times, Ireland was governed by the Norman Irish, and these, as the years went on, were tempted by their convenience to strengthen themselves by Irish alliances, to identify their interests with those of the native chiefs, in order to conciliate their support; to prefer the position of wild and independent sovereigns, resting on the attachment of a people whose affections they had gained by learning to resemble them, to that of military lords over a hostile population, the representatives of a distant authority, on which they could not rely.

This is a partial account of the Irish difficulty. We must look deeper, however, for the full interpretation of it; and outward circumstances never alone suffice to explain a moral transformation. The Roman military colonists remained Roman alike on the Rhine and on the Euphrates. The Turkish conquerors caught no infection from Greece, or from the provinces on the Danube. The Celts in England were absorbed by the Saxon invaders; and the Mogul and the Anglo-Indian alike have shown no tendency to assimilate with the Hindoo. When a marked type of human character yields before another, the change is owing to some element of power in that other, which coming in contact with elements weaker than itself, subdues and absorbe

The Irish spirit, which exercised so fatal a them. fascination, was enabled to triumph over the Prove for Norman in virtue of representing certain perennial tendencies of humanity, which are latent in all mankind, and which opportunity may at any moment develope. It was not a national spirit the class were never united, except by some common hatred; and the normal relation of the chiefs towards each other was a relation of chronic war and hostility. It was rather an impatience of control, a deliberate preference for disorder, a determination in each individual man to go his own way, whether it was a good way or a bad, and a reckless hatred of industry. The result was the inevitable one - oppression, misery, and wrong. But in detail faults and graces were so interwoven, that the offensiveness of the evil was disguised by the charm of the good; and even the Irish vices were the counterfeit of virtues, contrived so cunningly that it was hard to distinguish their true texture. The fidelity of the clanemen to their leaders was faultlessly beautiful; extravagance appeared like generosity, and improvidence like unselfishness; anarchy disguised itself under the name of liberty; and war and plunder were decorated by poetry as the honourable occupation of heroic natures. Such were the Irish with whom the Norman conquerors found themselves in contact; and over them all was thrown a peculiar imaginative grace, a careless atmosphere of humour, sometimes gay, sometimes melancholy, always attractive, which at once disarmed the hand which was raised to strike or punish them. These spirits were dangerous neighbours. Men who first entered the country at mature age might be fortified by experience against their influence, but on the young they must have exerted a charm of fatal potency. The foster-nurse first chanted the The foster-nurse first chanted the The foster-nurse spell over the cradle in wild passionate melo- the ministrate dies.\(^1\) It was breathed in the ears of the growing boy by the minstrels who haunted the halls,\(^2\) and the law-less attractions of disorder proved too strong for the manhood which was trained among so perilous associations.

For such a country, therefore, but one form of government could succeed - an efficient mili- A military tary despotism. The people could be whole- the only somely controlled only by an English deputy, which would sustained by an English army, and armed cooled. with arbitrary power, till the inveterate turbulence of their tempers had died away under repression, and they had learnt in their improved condition the value of order and role. This was the opinion of all statesmen who possessed any real knowledge of Ireland, from Lord Talbot under Henry VI. to the latest viceroy who attempted a milder method and found it fail. "If the king were as wise as Solomon the Sage," said the report of 1515, "he shall never subdue the wild Irish to his obedience without dread of the sword and of the might and strength of his power. As long as they may resist and save their lives, they will not obey the king." Unfortunately, although English statesmen were able to see the course which nught to be followed, it had been too inconvenient to pursue that The English win feetners. They had put off the evil day, course. tee the name. alty, but mapreferring to close their eyes against the misriot set upon chief instead of grappling with it resolutely; and thus, at the opening of the sixteenth century, when the hitherto neglected barbarians were about mit Tus comto become a sword in the pope's hands to fight giotoly Irish In the 16th the battle against the Reformation, the "king's entirer. It is enemies " had recovered all but absolute possession of the island, and nothing remained of Strongbow's conquests save the shadow of a titular sovereignty, and a country strengthened in hostility by the means which had been used to subdue it.

State of Ireland, and plan for its reformation: State Papers, Vol. II. 5, 26.

Some sayeth that the English noble folk much to deliver their children to the king's Irish enemies to foster, and therewith maketh bands. — State Papers, Vol. II. p. 18.

[&]quot;Harpere, rhymere, frish chroniclers, bards, and ishallys (balled singure) commonly go with praises to gautlemen in the English pale, praising a rhymes, otherwise called dance,' their extortions, robberies, and abuses as valuantness; which respiceth them in their evol doings, and procures a falent of Irish disposition and conversation in them."— Cowley to Cromwell: Ibid. Vol. II. p. 450. There is a remarkable passage to the name fact in Spenser's View of the State of Irishad.

The events on which we are about to enter require for their understanding a sketch of the posi-Division of tion of the various chiefs, as they were at this time scattered over the island. The English pale, originally comprising "the four shires," as they pale. were called, of Dablin, Kildare, Meath, and Uriel, or Louth, had been shorn down to half its old dimensions. The line extended from Dundalk to Ardee; from Ardee by Castletown to Kells; thence through Athboy and Trim to the Castle of Maynooth; from Maynooth it crossed to Claime upon the Liffey, and then followed up the line of the river to Ballimore Eustace, from which place it skirted back at the rear of the Wicklow and Dublin mountains to the forts at Dalkey, seven miles south of Dublin.1 This narrow strip alone, some fifty miles long and twenty broad, was in any sense English. Beyond the borders the common law of England was of no authority; the king's writ was but a strip of parchment; and the country was parcelled among a multitude of independent chieft, who acknowledged no sovereignty but that of strength, who levied tribute on the inhabitants of the pale as a reward for a nominal protection of their rights, and as a compensation for abstaining from the plunder of their farms. Their swords were their sceptres; their codes of right, the Brehon traditions, - a convenient system, which was called law, but which in practice was a happy contrivance for the composition of felonier.

Report on the State of Ireland: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 99.

These chiefs, with their dependent clans, were distributed over the four provinces in the follow- Ireland toing order. The Geraldines, the most power- pole above ful of the remaining Normans, were divided by the into two branches. The Geraldines of the Trial chief. south, under the Earls of Desmond, held botton.

1 Baron Finglas, in his suggestions for a reformation, urges that "no black rent be given no paid to any frishmen upon any of the four shires from henceforward." - Harris, p. 101. "Many an Irish captain heepoth and preserveth the king's subjects in pasce without hart of their enemies; masmach as some of those bath tribute yearly of English men not to the intent that they should escape harmiess. But to the intent to devour them, as the greedy bound delivereth the sheep from the wolf!" Bleets Papers, Vol. 11. pp. 15, 17.

Andrew — What is that which you call the Brokon Law? It is a word unto us altogether unknown.

It is a rule of right, unwritten, but delivered by tradition floor one to another, in which oftentimes there appeareth great show of equity in determining the right between parties, but in many things repugning quite both to God's law and man's. As, for example, in the mes of murder, the Brehon, that is, their judge, will compound between the murderer and the friends of the party murdered, which prosecute the action, that the ma efactor shall give unto them, or unto the child or wife of him that is slain, a recompense which they call an Eriarch. By which vile law of theirs many murden are made up and amothered. And this judge being, as he is called, the Lord's Brehon, adjudgeth, for the most part, a better share unto his Lord, that is the Lord of the soil, or the head of that cept, and also unto himself for his judgment, a greater portion than unto the plaintiffs or parties grieved. - Spenius's View of the State of Irefined. Spensor describes the system on he experienced it in active operation. Ancient written collect, one of the Breber laws, however, existed and still والمثمو

Limerick, Cork, and Kerry; the Geraldines of Leinster lay along the frontiers of the English pale; and the heads of the house, the Earls of Kildare, were the feudal superiors of the greater portion of the English counties. To the Butlers, Earls of Ormond and Ossory, belonged Kilkenny, Carlow, and Tipperary. The De Burghs, or Bourkes, as they called themselves, were scattered over Galway, Roscommon, and the south of Sligo, occupying the broad plains which lie between the Shannon and the mountains of Connemara and Mayo. This was the relative position into which these clans had settled at the Conquest, and it had been maintained with little variation.

The north, which had fallen to the Lacies and the De Courcies, had been wholly recovered by the Irish. The Lacies had become extinct. The De Courcies, once Earls of Ulster, had migrated to the south, and were reduced to the petty fief of Kinsale, which they held under the Desmonds. The Celtic chieftains had returned from the mountains to which they had been driven, bringing back with them, more intensely than ever, the Irish habits and traditions. Old men, who were alive in 1533, remembered a time when the Norman families attempted to live in something of an English manner, and when there were towns in the middle of Ireland with decent municipal institutions. The wars of the Roses had destroyed the remnants of English influence by calling away a number of leading

I By relation of ancient men in times past within remembrance, all the English force and gentills within the pale heretofore kept retinues of English permen in their houses, after the English fashion, according to the extent of their lands, to the great strength and succour of their neighbours the king's subjects. And now for the most part they keep horsened and knowes, which live upon the king's subjects; and keep in manner no hospitality, but live upon the poor. — The Council of Ireland to the Master of the Rolls, 1533: State Papers Vel. H. p. 143.

nobles, such especially as were least infected by the Irish character; and the native chiefs had Between of reoccupied the lands of their ancestors, more wounded. sisted, if not welcomed as allies. The O'Neils and O'Donnells had spread down over Ulster to the frontiers of the pale. The O'Connors and O'Carrolla had recrossed the Shannon, and pushed forwards into Kildare; the O'Connor Don was established in a castle near Portarlington, said to be one of the strongest in Ireland: and the O'Carrolls had seized Leap, an ancient Danish fortress, surrounded by bog and forest, a few miles from Parsonstown. O'Brien of Inchiquin, Prince - as he styled himself - of Thomond, no longer contented with his principality of Clare, had thrown a bridge across the Shannon five miles above Limerick. and was thus enabled to enter Munster at his pleasure and spread his authority towards the south; while the M'Carties and O'Sullivans, in Cork and Kerry, were only not dangerous to the Earls of Desmond, because the Desmonds were more Irish than themselves, and were accepted as their natural chiefs.

In Tipperary and Kilkenny only the Celtic reaction was held in check. The Earls of Ormond, the facts of Ormond, although they were obliged themselves to continue to live as Irish chieftains, and to govern by the to check Irish law, yet partly from an inherent nobility of nature, partly through family alliances and a more sustained intercourse with their English kindred, partly perhaps from the inveterate feud of their house with the Geraldines of Kildare, remained true to their allegiance, and maintained the English authority of the Ormonda to the Ormonda from rendering the assistance to the crown which they desired. Wexford, Wicklow, and the mountains of Dublin, were occupied by the Highland tribes of O'Bryne and O'Toole, who, in their wild glens and dangerous gorges, defied attempts to conquer them, and who were able, at all times, issuing down out of the passes of the hills, to cut off communication with the pale. Thus the Butlers had no means of reaching Dublin except through the county of Kildare, the home of their hereditary rivals and foes.

___,

This is a general account of the situation of the various parties in Ireland at the beginning of the sixteenth century. I have spoken only of the leading families; and I have spoken of them as if they possessed some feudal supremacy, - yet even this slight thread of order was in many cases without real consistency, and was recognised only when fear, or passion, or interest, prompted. "There be sixty counties, called regions, in Ireland," says the report Sixty chiaf tords in Iraof 1515, "inhabited with the king's Irish eneland, who made war sad perce he mies, some regions as big as a shire, some them Astron, and Obeyed more, some less, where reigneth more than only the sixty chief captains, whereof some calleth themselves kings, some king's peers in their language, some princes, some dukes, that I veth only by the sword, and obeyeth to no other temporal person save only to Firself that is strong. And every of the said captains maketh war and peace for himself, and holdeth by the sword, and hath imperial jurisdiction, and obeyeth no other person, English or Irish, except only to such persons as may subdue him by the sword. Also, in every of the said regions, there be livers In such of these staty petty captains, and every of them maketh districts divers petty suptains, war and peace for himself, without licence of his chief captain. . . . And there be more who should than thirty of the English noble folk that fol-pendence. loweth this same Irish order, and keepeth the same rule." I Every man, in short, who could raise himself to that dishonourable position, was captain of a troop of banditti, and counted it his chief honour to live upon the plunder of his neighbour.

This condition of things might have been expected to work its own cure. The earth will not support human life uncultivated, and men will not labour without some reasonable hope that they will enjoy the fruit of their labour. Anarchy, therefore, is usually why shortlived, and perishes of inanition. ruly persons must either comply with the euro. terms on which alone they are permitted to subsist, and consent to submit to some kind of order, or they must die. The Irish, however, were enabled to escape from this most wholesome provision by the recklessness of the people, who preferred any extremity of suffering to the endurance of the least restraint, and by the tyranny under which the labouring poor were oppressed. In England, the same hands were trained to hold the sword and to hold the plough. The labourers and the artisans in peace were the soldiers in war. In Ireland. labour was treated as disgraceful; the chiefs picked out the strongest and fiercest of their subjects, and trained them only to fight; the labourers were driven to the field as beasts of burden, and compelled to work on the chance that the harvest might be secured. this precarious means, with the addition of the wild cattle which roamed in thousands among the woods and bogs, sufficient sustenance was extracted from the wil to support a scanty population, the majority of whom were supposed to be the most wretched specimens of human nature which could be found upon the globe. "What common folk in all this world," the report says, " is so poor, so feeble, so evil beseen in town and field, so bestial, so greatly oppressed and trodden under foot, fares so evil, with so great misery, and with so wretched life, as the common folk of Ireland? What pity is here, what ruth is to report, there is no tongue that can tell, ne person that can write. It passeth far the orators and muses all to shew the order of the nobles, and how cruel they entreateth the poor common people. What danger it is to the king against God to suffer his land, whereof he bears the charge and the cure temporal, to be in the said misorder so long without remedy. It were more honour to surrender his claim thereto, and to make no longer prosecution thereof, than to suffer his poor subjects always to be so oppressed, and all the nobles of the land to be at war within themselves, always shedding of Christian blood without remedy. The herd must render account for his fold; and the king for his." 1

Beste Papers, Vol. II pp. 1, 8, 4.

The English writer did not exaggerate the picture, for his description is too abundantly confirmed Ringtob catiin every page of the Celtic Annalists, with only but a single difference. To the Englishman the perpetual disturbance appeared a dishonour and disgrace; to the Celt it was the normal and natural employment of human beings, in the pursuit of which lay the only glory and the only manly pleasure.

A population of such a character presented in itself difficulty sufficiently formidable; and this difficulty was increased by the character of the family on whom the circumstances of their position most obliged the English government to rely. There were two methods of maintaining the show of English sovereignty. Either an English deputy might reside in Dublin, supported by a standing army; or it was necessary to place confidence in one or other of the great Irish noblemen, and to govern through him. Either method had its disadvantages. The expense of the first van enormous, for the pay of the common soldier was sixpence or eightpence a-day — an equivalent of six or eight shillings; and as the arrival of an English deputy was the signal for a union throughout Ireland of all septs and clans against a common enemy, his presence was worse than useless, unless he could maintain a body of efficient troops numerous enough to cope with the coalition. At the same time the cost, great as it would have been, must have fallen wholly on the crown, for the parliaments would make no grants of money for the support of a mercenary army, except on axtraordinary emergencies.

¹ State Papers, Vol. H. p. 14.

On the other hand, to choose an Irish deputy was to acquiesce in disorder, and to lend a kind of official sanction to it. It was inexpensive, however, and therefore convenient; and evils which were not actually felt in perpetual demands for money, and in uncomfortable reports, could for a time be forgotten or ignored. In this direction lay all the temptations. The condition of the country was only made known to the English government through the deputy, who could represent it in such colours as he pleased; and the government could persuade themselves that evils no longer complained of had ceased to exist.

This latter method, therefore, found most favour in London. Irish noblemen were glad to accept the office of deputy, and to discharge it at a low salary or none; but it was in order to abuse their authority The personment of leafor their personal advantage. They indemlacel conducted by Irish noblenatical themselves for their exertions to keep order, which was not kept, by the extortion which they practised in the name of the government which they represented; and thus deservedly made the English rule more than ever detested. Instead of receiving payment, they were allowed while dep-Jorge and uties what was called "covne and livery"; deputies. that is to say, they were allowed to levy military survice, and to quarter their followers on the farmers and poor gentlemen of the pale; or else to raise fines in composition, under pretence that they were engaged in the service of the crown. The entire cost of this system was estimated at the enormous sum of a hundred pounds a day. The exactions might have been tolerated if the people had been repaid by protec-

The deputy with to make great rodes, journeys, and hostings, now in the north parts of Uniter now in the south parts of Munster, now in the west parts of Connaught, and taketh the king's subjects with him by compulsion of times, with victual for three or four weeks, and chargeth the common people with carriage of the same, and giveth licence to all the noble talk to cesse and rear their costs on the common people and on the king's poor subjects; and the end of that journey is commonly no other in effect, but that the deputy meets to receive a reward of orm or two hundred kyne to huncel(, and so depart, without any more hurt to the king's enemmes, after that he hath turned the king's subjects and the poor common feck to their charge and costs of two or three thousand pounds. And over that, the deputy, on his progress and regress, appreciate the king's poor common folk with home meet and man's meet to all his heat. And over that, in summer, when grass is most plenty, they must have onto or mait to their home at will, or else money therefor.

The pression considered some saith the king's deputy, by extertion, chargeth the king's poor subjects and common folk, in home meat and mean ment, by estimation, to the value of a hundred pound every day in the year, one lay counted with another, which conoch to the sum of $6,000 pounds yearly — State Popers, Vol. 11. p. 13. Fingles says that course and livery would destroy hall itself, if it was used there. — Fingles's Presists tion; but forced as they were to pay black mail at the same time to the Irish borderers, the double burdens had the effect of driving every energetic set—the pape, and his place was filled approtected the pale, and his place was filled the pale, by some poor Irishman whom use had made the pale.

acquainted with misery.

Nor was extortion the only advantage which the Irish deputies obtained from their office. The Govern They prosecuted their private feuds with the date, from revenues of the state. They connived at the son, the crimes of any chieffain who would join their doputes. faction. Every conceivable abuse in the administration of the government attended the possession of power by the Geraldines of Kildare, and yet by the Geraldines it was almost inevitable that the power should be held. The choice lay between the Kildares and the Ormonds. No other nobleman could pretend to compete with these The Earls of Desmond only could take rank as their equals; and the lordships of Desmond were at the opposite extremity of the island. The services of the Earls of Ormond were almost equally unavailable When an Earl of Ormond was residing at Dublin as deputy, he was separated from his clan by fifty miles of dangerous road. The policy of the Geraldines was to secure the government for themselves by making it impossible for any other person to govern; and the appointment of their rival was a signal for the revolt of the policy of the entire clan, both in Leinster and Munster ter. The Butlers were too weak to resist this combination; and inasmuch as they were the properties themselves always loyal when a Geraldine was in power, and the Geraldines were disloyal when a Butler was in power, the desire to hush up the difficulty, and to secure a show of quiet, led to the consistent preference of the more convenient chief.

YOL IL

17

¹ The wretchedness of the country drove the Irish to emigrate in multi-tudes. In 1894, twenty thousand of them had settled themselves in Pembrokeshire; and the majority of these had crossed in a single twelvemouth. They brought with them Irish manners, and caused no little trouble. The king's town of Temby," wrote a Welsh gentleman to Wohey, "is almost clean Irish, as well the head men and rulers as the commons of the mid-town; and of their high and presumptuous minds [they] do disobey all manner the king's process that cometh to them out of the king's exchequar of Pembroke."— R. Gryfith to Cardinal Wolsey. Ellis, first series Vol. I. p. 191, &cc.

There were qualities also in the Kildare family which gave them peculiar influence, not in Ireland only, but at the English court. Living like wild Irish in their castle at Maynooth, they appeared in London with the address of polished courtiers. When the complaints against them became too serious to neglect, they were summoned to give account of their conduct. They had only to present themselves before the council, and it was at once impossible to believe that the frank, humorous, high-minded gentlemen at the bar could be the monsters who were charged with so fearful crimes. Their ever-ready wit and fluent words, their show of bluntness and pretence of simplicity, disarmed anger and dispersed calumny; and they returned on all such occasions to Ireland more trusted than ever, to laugh at the folly which they had duped.

The farce had already continued through two generthe eighth ations at the opening of the Reformation for of Kill
dervice rebeldervice reb

down this new King-maker. He took the earl prisoner, with some difficulty, and despatched him to He appears London, where he appeared at the councilboard, hot-handed from murder and treason. king told him that heavy accusations would be laid to his charge, and that he had better choose some counsel to plead his cause. The earl looked at him with a smile of simplicity. " I will choose the ablest in England," he said; " your Highness I take for my counsel against these false knaves." The accusations were proceeded with. Among other enormities, Kildare had burnt the cathedral at Cashel, and the archbishop was present as witness and prosecutor. The earl confessed his offence: "but by Jasus," he added, "I would not have done it if I had not been told that my lord archbishop was inside." The insolent wit, and the danger of punishing so popular a nobleman, passed the reply as sufficient. The council laughed. "All who decide Ireland cannot govern this earl," said one. Ireland can-"Then let this earl govern all Ireland," was but, be much the prompt answer of Henry VII.4 He was land. sent over a convicted traitor, — he returned a knight of the Garter, lord deputy, and the representative of the crown. Rebellion was a successful policy, and a lesson which corresponded so closely to the Irish temper was not forgotten.

"What, thou fool," said Sir Gerald Shaneson to a younger son of this nobleman, thirty years Rebellion later, when he found him slow to join the with the rebellion against Henry VIII. "What, thou consistence fool, thou shalt be the more esteemed for it. For what hadst thou, if thy father had not done so? What was he until he crowned a king here, took Garth, the king's captain, prisoner, hanged his son, resisted Poynings and all deputies; killed them of Dublin upon Oxinantown Green; would suffer no man to rule here for the king but Limself! Then the king regarded him, and made him deputy, and married thy mother to him; 1 or else thou shouldst never have had a foot of land, where now thou mayest dispend four hundred marks by the year." 2

Campion. Lelead.

¹ Leland, Vol. II. p. 110.

^{*} Campion's History of Freiand. Leland, Vol. II. p. 111.

These scornful words express too truly the position of the Earl of Kildare, which, however, he found it convenient to disguise under a decent exterior. The borders of the pale were partially extended; the O'Tooles were driven further into the Wicklew mountains, and an outlying castle was built to overawe them at Powerscourt. Some shadow of a revenue was occasionally raised; and by this show of service, and because change would involve the crown in expense, he was allowed to go his own way. He held his ground till the close of his life, and dying, he left behind him a son trained on his father's model, and who followed with the utmost faithfulness in his father's steps.

Gerald, son of Gerald, ninth earl, became deputy, almost it seemed by right of inheritance, in the south the seemed and things were allowed to continue in their old course for another five years; when at length Henry VIII. awoke to the diagrace which the condition of the country reflected upon him. The report of 1515 was the first step gained; the Earl of Ormond contributed to the effect produced by the report, with representations of the conduct of the deputy, who had been fortifying his own castle with government stores; and the result was a resolution to undertake measures of real vigour. In 1520, Indeposed in 1520, and the the Earl of Kildare was deprived of his office, Earl of Surrey and sent for to England. His place was place taken by the Earl of Surrey, who of all living Englishmen combined in the highest degree the necessary qualities of soldier and statesman. It seemed as if the old weak forbearance was to last no longer, and as if Ireland was now finally to learn the needful lesson of obedience.

¹ The earl married Elizabeth, daughter of Oliver St. John, while in London.

Support to Cromwall, apparently by Allen, Master of the Rolle: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 175.

But the first efforts to cure an inveterate evil rarely succeed; and Henry VIII., like every other statesman who has undertaken to reform Ireland, was to purchase experience by failure. The report had detailed that clared emphatically that the Irish chiefs the last that would never submit so long as they might to returned resist, and escape with their lives; that contend the tyrannical lords and gentlemen must be conceed into equity by the sword freely used.

The king, however, was young and sanguine; he was unable to accept so hard a conclusion; The king will be could not believe that any body of human is beings were so hopelessly inaccessible to the ordinary means of influence as the Irish gentlemen were represented to be. He would first try persuasion, and have recourse to extremity only if persuasion failed.

His directions to the Earl of Surrey, therefore, were that at the earliest opportunity he should call an assembly of so many of the Irish chiefs as the shield on the could induce to come to him, and to discourse to them upon the elementary principles of social order and government.

"We think it expedient," he wrote, "that when ye shall call the lords and other captains of that our land before you, as of good congruence ye must needs do; ye, after and amongst other overtures by your wisdom then to be made, shall declare unto them the great decay, ruin, and desolation of that commodious and fertile land, for lack of politic governance and good justice; which can never be brought in order unloss the unbridled sensualities of insolent folk be brought under the rule of the laws. For realms without justice be but tyrannies and robberies, more consonant to beastly appetites than te the laudable life of reasonable creatures.

He is to tunch them that realms. without justice be but Syranaics.

And whereas wilfulness doth reign by strength without law or justice, there is no distinction of propriety in dominion; ne yet any man may say this is mine, but by strength the weaker is subdued and oppressed, which is contrary to all laws, both of God and man. Howbeit, our mind is, not that we shall He le not, bowever, to impress on them any opinion by fearful words, that we intend to expel them from their lands and dominions lawfully possessed; no yet that we be minded to constrain them precisely to obey our laws, ministered by our justices there; but under good man-But he is to persuade, ner to show unto them that of necessity it is requisite that every reasonable creature be governed

And they may obey their own laws if they prefer it, if those laws be good and Masoundia, To only that they obey BOURS LAW, nd de not New air will.

by a law. And therefore, if they shall allege that our laws there used be too extreme and rigorous; and that it should be very hard for them to observe the same; then ye may further ensearch of them under what manners, and by what laws, they will be ordered and governed, to the intent that if their laws be good and reasonable, they may be approved; and the rigour of our laws, if they shall think them too hard, be mitigated and brought to such moderation as they may conveniently live under the same. By which means ye shall finally induce them of necessity to conform their order of living to the observance of some reasonable law, and not to live at will as they have used here-tofore."

So wrote Henry in 1520, being then twenty-eight years old, in his inexperience of human nature, and especially of the Irish form of it. No words could be truer, wiser, or more generous; but those only listen effectively to words of wisdom and generosity, who themselves possess something of the same qualities; and the Irish would not have required that such an address should be made to them if they had been capable of profiting by it. If Surrey was sanguine of any good result, he was soon undeceived. He surrey had no sooner landed than the whole country instant rewas in arms against him, - O'Neile, O'Car- bellion, roll, O'Connor, O'Brien, Desmond, broke into simultaneous rebellion, acting, as was proved by instigated by intercepted letters," under instructions which Kintare Kildare had sent from England. Surrey saw at a glance the justice of the language of the re- Advice of port. He informed Wolsey briefly of the sill or nothstate of the country, and advised that unless ing.

I Harry VIII. to the Earl of Surrey: Sinte Papers, Vol. II. pp. 52, 53.

This is one of them, and another of similar import was found to have been sent to O'Neile. "Life and health to O'Carroll, from the Earl of Kildare. There is none Irishman in Ireland that I am better content with than with you; and whenever I come into Ireland I skall do you good fo: anything that we shall do for me; and any displeasure that I have done to you, I shall make you amends therefore, desiring you to keep good peace to Englishmen till an English deputy shall come thither, do your best to make war upon Englishmen then, except such as be towerf me, whom you know well yourself "—State Papers, Vol. II. p. 45.

the king was prepared for extreme measures, he should not waste money in partial efforts. I Writing subsequently to Henry himself, he said that the work to be done was a repetition of the conquest of Wales by Edward I., and it would prove at least, as tedious and as expensive. Nevertheless, if the king could make up his mind to desire it, there was no insuperable diffi culty. He would undertake the work himself with six thousand men. The difficulty would be then, however, but half overcome, for the habits of the people were incurable. Strong castles must be built up and down the island, like those at Conway and Carnarvon; and a large immigration would be necessary of English colonists.2 Either as much as this should be done, the earl thought, or nothing. Half measures only made bad into worse; and a policy of repression, if not consistently maintained, was unjust and pernicious. It encouraged the better affected of the inhabitants to show their good will to the government; and when the Irish were again in power, these persons were marked for vengeance.

Practical experience was thus laid against Henry's philosophy; and it would have been well if the king could have discerned clearly on which side the truth was likely to lie. For the misfortune of Ireland, this was not the case. It was inconvenient at the moment to undertake a costly conquest. Surrey was maintained with a short retinue, and from want of power could only enter upon a few partial expeditions. He inflicted a heavy defeat upon O'Neile; he stormed a castle of O'Connor's; and showed, with the small means at his disposal, what he might have ione with far less support than he had required. He went where he pleased through the country. But his course was "as the way of a ship through the sea, or as the way of a bird through the air." The elements yielded without resist ance, and closed in behind him; and, after eighteen months of manful exertion, feeling the uselessness of further enterprises conducted on so small a scale, to the sorrow and alarm of the Irish council, he desired and obtained his recal."

Atate Papers, Vol. II. p. 52.

Surrey to Henry VIII.: State Papers, Vol. II. pp. 72-74.

Meanwhile, in England, the Earl of Kildare had made good use of his opportunities. In spite Kilders Suda of his detected letters, he had won his way hour. into favour. He accompanied Henry to the Field of the Cloth of Gold, where he distinguished himself by his brilliant bearing; and instead of punishing him as a traitor, the king allowed him to marry Lady Elizabeth Grey, daughter of the Marquis of Dorset, and nearly related to the blood royal. He was Elitare rethen permitted to return to Ireland; not, tomateless however, immediately as deputy. An intermediate effort was made to govern through . Lord Ormand, whose intentions were excellent, but unfortunately the Irish refused to submit to The Geralhim. The Earl of Desmond remained in dince robel, rebellion, and invaded Kilkenny from the south; and two years followed of universal insurrection, pillage, and murder. Kildare accused Ormond to the English souncil as responsible; * Ormond retorted with similar tharges against Kildare; and commissioners were sent over to "investigate," with instructions, if they saw reason, to replace Kildare in his old office.

Council of Ireland to Walsey: State Papers, Vol. II pp. 92, 93.

Campion says Kildare had a friend in the Duke of Suifolk. — Bistory of Ireland, by Edward Campion, p. 161.

The permission was sufficient; in 1524 he was again deputy; and no deliberate purpose of misrule could have led to results more fatal. The earl, made bold by impunity, at once prepared for a revolt from the English crown. Hitherto he had been contented to make himself essential to the maintenance of the English sovereignty; he now launched out into bolder measures, and encouraged by Henry's weakness, resolved to dare the worst extremity. the breaking out of the French war of 1523-Beam va.d. maker u 24, his kinsman, the Earl of Desmond, opened fongue with Francis L., a negotiation with Francis I. for the landing of a French army in Munster.1 Kildare, while professing that he was endeavouring to take Des-Kildare sepredy conmond prisoner, was holding secret interviews plving at it, and preparwith him to concert plans for a united move." peneral inand was strengthening himself at the same CONTRACTOR. time with alliances among the native chiefs. One of his daughters became the wife of the O'Connor; another married O'Carroll, of Leap Castle: and a third the Baron of Slane; and to leave no doubt of his intentions, he transferred the cannon and military stores from Dubin Castle to his own fortress at Maynooth. Lord Ormond sent information to England of these proceedings, but he could gain no hearing. For three years the Geraldines were allowed to continue their preparations undisturbed; and perhaps they might have matured their plans at leisure, so odious The state of Iredand behad become the mention of Ireland to the strans at last dangerous. English statesmen, had not the king's divorce, ² Act of Attainder of the Earl of Kildare: Irisk Statute Book, 23 Heat FMI cap. 1. An account of this negotiation is to be seen in a paper in the British Museum, Titus, B. xi. fol. 852.

Act of Attainder of the Earl of Kildare: Ibid.

The elder sisters of the "fair Geraldina" of Lord Surrey.

by embroiling him with the pope and emperor, made the danger serious.

The alliance of England and France had disconcerted the first scheme. No sooner was this Demond apnew opportunity opened than, with Kildare's enpure. consent, Desmond applied to Charles V. with similar overtures.1 This danger was too serious to be neg-

1 The emperor's chaplain, Gosale Fernandez, was the agent through whom the correspondence with Desmond was conducted - Se to Papers, Vol. VII p. 186. And see Cotton M.S., Verpanian. c iv fol 264, 276, 285, 206, 207. — " He sent unto the emperour, provoking and entering hua to send an army into this said land." - Act of A.tainder of the Earl of Kildare. See also Leland, Vol. II. p. 136.

The account given by Goussie Fernandez of his visit to Desmond is smong the Archives at Brussels, and supplies a quelous ricture of the state of the country.

Report of Gonzale Fernandez. -

"April 28, 1529.

"On arriving at the coast of Ireland we touched at a port belonging to the King of England named Cork. Many of the Irish people came on board the ship, and told me that the gentleman of the Earl of Desmond had just returned from Spain with presents from the Emperor to the earl-

"Leaving Cork, we were driven by bad weather into another harbour called Beran,* from whence I sent one of my servants to inform the earl of my arrival. In four days the earl's answer came, telling me that I was welcome, and that he was at a place called Dingle, where he hoped to see me. He addressed his letter to me as "Chapiain of our Sovereign Lord the Emperor; and this, I understand, in his usual mode of expression when speaking of his Majesty. He had also sent to some of the other noblemen: of the country, with whom he proposed to form a league, to tell there of my

" I set out again, and on the way five of the earl's people came to me to may that their master had gone to a harbour a few miles off to capture owner French and English vessels there, and would be glad of my assistance This I declined, and the earl, I understand, was musified with my axcuses.

" The day after, the flist of April, we reached the said harbour of Dingle and were honourably received by the townspeople, and by a party of the earl's attendants. About four s'clock the earl returned himself, attended by fifty home and as many halberdiers. He came at once to my quarters, and asked after the welfare of 'our Lord the Emperor.' I replied that, by the grace of God, his Majosty was well, and I had seat his commendations to his lenkship.

* Buchton, pelapi

lected; and in 1527, Kildare was a second time summoned to London. He went, so "We then direct and afterwards the enri and his council repaired to my chamber, where we presented him with his Majorty's tester. He read it and his special read it. His Majorty, he small referred him to me. I was communicated to make known his Majorty's pleasure to him. I at once declared my instructions, first in English to the earl, and afterward in Latin to his sense; I; which I said were to this effect.

"'One Godfrey, a triend of their lord, had antily presented blueself to the European with their lord's letter, in which their seri, after speaking of the gund-will and affection which he entertained towards the Emperor's Majesty, had expressed a desire to enter into close allennes with his Majesty, as friend to freed and enemy to enemy, duclaring beautif ready, in all things and at all times, to obey his Majesty's commands.

" Further, the said Godfrey had requested the Emperer to send a softdential pursue to Ireland, to learn more particularly their lard's intentions and his summers and power; and further, to acquitate a trusty and estabish a firm and complete alliance. For these purposes the Emperor commissional myself is was the bearer to them of his Majorcy's thanks for their proposals, and I said I was so for in my master a senf-dance that I was msured their lord might up pact all possible assistance at the Emperor's hands."

"When I had door, the earl spoke a few words to his council—the then took off his cap, and and he thanked his Majorty for his gracious condemansion. He had addressed himself to his Majorty on to his severeign look to entress his protection. It is Majorty was placed in this world in his high position, in order that no one prace might approx or in ore another. He related his descent to use. He said that between his family and the fing ish, there had over existed a mortal easity, and he explained the entre to see.

"I replied that he Majorty never falled to support his allies and his subjects, and should be claim assistance in that appecity, he Majorty would help him as he helped all his other good freeds. I advised the earl to put in writing he words which he had used to me. He though, it would be snough if I repeated them, but when I earl the story was too long, and my memory magist not return it with necessary, he said he would do as Il desired.

"We then spoke of the support for which he was looking, of his projects and resources, and of the places in which he proposed to serve. He said he wasted from his Hajesty four large vessels, two headred tens each, and places well provided with artiflery, and five headred Floreings to work them. I said at once and assumptly, that such a domaind was out of all resource, before he, on his part, had achieved something in his Hajesty's corving a remonstrated faily and largely, alt much to avoid being tedams, I smit the dotain. In the end his conneil were establed that he must reduce his featureds till his Majesty had some reason to know what was to be expected from him, and he consented, as will be seen by his own memory.

Of all now in the world the earl historymore decayly the Cardinal of Tork.

confident was he of the weakness of the government, and again he was found to have calculated justly. He

He told me he had been in alliance with Frence, and had a relation called De Quindel, now with the French army in Italy. In future, he said he would have no dealings with the French. As your Majesty's enemies, they were his enemies.

"Your Majesty will be pleased to understand that there are in Ireland four principal cities. The city of Dublin in the largest and richest in the lated, and neither in the town nor in the neighbourhood has the Earl of Desmond land or subjects. The Earl of Kildare is sovereign in that district, but that earl is a kinsman of the Earl of Desmond, and has married his censin.

"The Earl of Kildare, however, is at present a prisoner in the Tower of London.

"Of the other three cities, one is called Waterford, the second Cork, the third Lumerick; and in all of these the Earl of Desmond has problems and variable. He has dominious, also, among the wild tribes, he has lords and haughts on his estates who pay him tribute. He has some ailies, but not so many, by a great deal, as he has evenues.

"He has ten cartles of his own, some of which are strong and well built, especially one named Dungarvan, which the King has often attempted to take without success.

"The earl hunself is from thirty to forty years old, and is rather above the middle height. He keeps better justice throughout his dominious than any other chief in Ireland. Robbers and homicides find no mercy, and are executed out of hand. His people are in high order and discipline. They are armed with short bows and swords. The earl's guard are in a mail from neck to heel, and carry haiberds. He has also a number of horse, some of whom know how to break a lance. They all ride admirably without saddle or stirrup."

After the report of Gonzalvo Fernandez, Desmond himself continues in Latio.

"Herounto be added informations addressed to the invincible and most mered Gasar, ever august, by the Earl of Desmond, Lord of Ogonyil and the liberties of Kalarygge.

"I, James Earl of Desmond, am of soyal blood, and of the race of the Crequeror who did lawfully subdue Britain, great and small, and did reduce Se tland and Ireland under his yoke.

"The first cause of the enmity between myself and the King of England is to ancient prophecy or prediction, believed by the Englash nation, and western in their books and chromicles, that all England will be conquered by an Earl of Desmand, which enterprise I have not yet undertaken-

"The second cause is that, through fear of this prophecy, the King of England has committed his powers to my predecessors who have been rule in freisind; and when Thomas Earl of Desmond, my grandfather is peaceable manner attended Parliament ir. Iraland, no cause being al-

was arraigned before the council, over whelmed with meters invectives by Wolsey, and sent to the Tower.

But he escaped by his old art. No sooner legal spring him, but marely is dread of the prophecy, they struck of his band.

"The third cause is that, when Richard, see of the King of England (see), beard that there were ancient fouds between the English and my projectorous, he came to iroland with an army and a great feet in the time of my father, and then did my father make all Iroland to be subdeed unto himself, some few towns only excepted.

"The fourth cause is that, by reason of the abrevald feeds, the King of England did rause thruld Earl of Kildare, my fether's knowner, to be destroyed in prison [destroy in corosribus] until that my fether, by might and power, did liberate the said Earl of Kildare, and did obtain he own performs and did make his kineman viceroy of Ireland.

"The 66th source in that, when prace was hardly begun between my afterestid father and the King of England, a certain elektron fell spon my father, I myself being then eight years old.

"The King, when he heard this, made a league of Irish and English to kill my fether; he bring thus, as they thought, unable to take the feld. They, being banded together, made war against my father for twen y-four years, wherein, by God's grace, they had small success.

"The sixth cause is that, when peace was made at last between the King that now is and myself, I, in thith of the said peace, out certain of my envisate to the parts beyond the seas to Flanders and France, and the afterneys of the King of England did despoil my certains of the sem of 90004, and throw them into preces, where they now remain.

" Hereon follows my pupplication: —

"These things premised, I, the aformald earl, do implete and entreat the inviscible and most enered Mayasty of Comer Augustee that he will deeps to provide me with remedy, and I, with all my horses and people, do derote stynelf to your Majesty's service, seeing that your Majesty is appeared for the welfare of the oppressed, and to be lord paramount of all the earth.

"Who passeth not when he serve, might he change his master, sent his suchdentes with letters of credence to Francis the French King, and to Charles the Emparer, prefering the help of Muneter and Connecepts towards the conquest of Irahard, if atther of them would help to win it from our hing. What procepts, what memages have been sent you to apprehend him? and yet not done. Why so? Forecoth I could not catch him. Yes, are, it will be every and deposed to your face, that for four of meeting him, yet have weaked, witfully shareard his sight, altered your source, warned his iffends, stopped both eyes and earn against his detection. Surely this jugging and false play little became an honest man called to such honous, in a positionan put in such trust." — Campann, p. 166.

was he committed, than Ledy Elizabeth Fitzgerald, who had accompanied him to England, hurried back across the Channel to the castle of her brotherordenance in-law, O'Connor. The robber chief inpaid, and stantly rose and attacked the pale. The takes the vice-deputy Marchers opened their lines to give his handitti free passage into the interior; 2 and he seized and

'To revenge the injuries done to enyself and my family by the King of England, I have the following powers; that is to say, 14,500 foot and 1500 home. Also I have friends, confederate with me, whose names be those —

 The Prince O'Brien, who can make 500 horse and 1000 foot. 2. Trobal de Burgh 100 600 200 3. Sir Richard Poer 4. Lord Thomas Butler 60 940 5. Sir John Galty 400 6. Sir Gerald Fitzgerald 200 7. The White Knight 400 800 2. O'Donnell, Prince of Ulster , 4000 800 2. The Knight of the Valley 240 40 10. Baron MacMys 500 40 11. Captain Macguire 80 200

With divers others whose names be here emitted.

"Moreover, I, the aforesaid James Earl of Deemond, do make known to the Majesty of Casar august, that there is an alliance between me and the King of Scotland, and, by frequent embassies, we understand each other's purposes and intentions.

"Finally, divine grace permitting, I intend to gather together my own and my friends' powers, and lead them in person against Plers Butler, deputy of the King of England, and against Limerick, Wexford, and Dublia, the cities which the King holds in Iraland.

"For the aid for which I look from your Majesty, I desire especially connon available for land service and fit for breaching castles. May it please your Majesty, therefore, to send me cannon, that I may be the better able to do your Majesty service.

"And for myself, I promise on my faith to obey your Majesty is all bings. I will be friend of your friends; enemy of your encades; and your Majesty's especial and particular subject. If ever I chance to displease you, I will submit myself to your correction and chastisement.

The Polyrin, pp. 171-176.

State Papers, Vol. II. pp. 148, 147.
 Morfelk to Wolsey: Ibid. p. 136.

carried off prisoner the Baron of Delvin, who had been made vice-deputy on Kildare's departure. Desmond meanwhile held Ormond in check at Kilkenny, and prevented him from sending assistance to Dublin; and the Irish council were at once prostrate and helpless.

Henry VIII., on receipt of this intelligence, instead of sending Kildare to the block and equipping an army, condescended to write a letter of remonstrance to "A letter from the king!" said the insolent chieftain when it was brought to him, "what king! If I may live one year, I trust to see Ireland in that case that there shall be no more mention here of the King of England than of the King of Spain." 2 Still, however, it was thought inconvenient to venture extremities. Henry allowed himself to make use of Kildare's assistance to soothe the immediate storm? An old desire of the Irish had been that some prince of the blood should govern them; he nominated, The Buke of therefore, his natural son, the Duke of Richmond, as viceroy; and having no adequate force in Ireland to resist an insurrection, and no immediate means of despatching any such force, he was once more obliged to pardon and restore the traitorous Geraldine; appointing, at the same time, Sir William Skeffington, a moderately able man, though Ekellington made deputy too old for duty, as the Duke of Richmond's to govern deputy, and directing him to govern with the of Klidare. advice and cooperation of the Earl of Kildare.

To this disastrous weakness there was but one coun
John Allen terpoise — that the English party in the coun
Architector cil of Ireland was strengthened by the ap-

¹ State Papers, Vol. II. p. 148.

² It had been partially subdued by Lord James Butler — Irich statute.
Merry VIII. cap. 1.

^{*} O'Brian of Thomond to Henry VIII.: State Papers, Vol. II.

pointment of John Allen to the archbishopric of Dubin and the office of chancellor. Allen was one of the many men of talent who owed their elevation to Wolsey. He was now sent over to keep watch on Kildare, and to supply the government with accurate information which might be relied upon as a ground for action. Till this time (and the fact is one which ought to be borne in mind), the government had been forced to depend for their knowledge of the state of the country either on the representations of the deputy, or the private accusations of his personal enemies; both of them exceedingly untrustworthy sources. Henceforward there runs a clear stream of light through the fog and night of confusion, furnished either Ly the archbishop or by Allen, Master of the Rolls, who was most likely his kinsman.

The policy of conciliation, if conduct so feeble deserves to be called a policy at all, had now reached its limit; and it amounted to confessed imbecility. Twice deposed from power on clear evidence of high treason. Lord Kildare was once more restored. It cost him but a little time to deliver himself of the presence of Skeffington; and in 1532 he was again sole deputy. All which the Earl of Surrey had fore- deputy. told came to pass. Archbishop Allen was deprived of the chancellorship, and the Archbishop of Armagh, a creature of the Geraldines, was substituted in his place. Those noblemen and gentlemen who had lent themselves to the interests of the English in the earl's absence were persecuted, imprisoned, or murdered. They had ventured to be loyal from a belief in the assurances which had been made to them; but the government was far off and Kildare was near; and such of them as he condescended to spare "were now TOL. U.

į

driven in self-defence, maugre their wills, to follow with the rest." 1 The wind which filled the sails of the ship in which Kildare returned, blew into flames the fires of insurrection; and in a very Satumalia of Irish madness the whole people, with no object that could be discovered but for very delight in disorder itself, began to tear themselves to pieces. Lord Thomas Butler was murdered by the Geraldines; Kildare himself was shot through the body in a skirmish; Powerscourt was burnt by the O'Tooles; and Dublin Castle was sacked in a sudden foray by O'Brien Oge. O'Neile was out in the north; Desmond in the south; and the English pale was overrun by brigands. I Ireland had found its way into its ideal condition - that condition towards which its instincts pernetually tended, and which at length it had undisputedly reached. The Allens furnished the king Compatch of with a very plain report of the effect of his leniency. They dwelt boldly on the mistakes which had been made. Reëchoing the words of the Report of 1515, they declared that the only hope for the country was to govern by English deputies; and that to grudge the cost seemed " consonant to the nature of him that rather than he will depart with fourpence he will jeopard to lose twenty shillings - which fourpence, disbursed in time, might have saved the other." They spoke well of the common Irish. "If well governed," they said, "the Irish would be found as civil, politic, and active, as any other nation. But what subjects under any prince in the world," they taked, "would love or defend the rights of that prince who, notwithstanding their true hearts and obedience, would afterwards put them under the governance of such as would persecute and destroy them?" Faith must be kept with those to whom promises had been made, and the habit of rewarding treason with concessions must be brought to an end. "Till great men suffer for their offences," they added, signifi reasons must be brought to an end. "Till great men suffer for their offences," they added, signifi reasons must be brought to an end. "Till great men suffered cantly, "your subjects within the English there would be not peaked there would be not peaked there would be not peaked to their goods and lives. Therefore, let your deputy have in commandment to do justice upon great thieves and malefactors, and to spare your pardons." 1

¹ Report of 1888: Biate Papers, Vol. II. pp. 168-179.

¹ State Papers, Vol. II. p. 180.

These were but words, and such words had been already spoken too often to deaf ears; but the circumstances of the time were each day growing more perilous, and necessity, the true mother of statesmanship, was doing its work at last.

The winter months passed away, bringing only an increase of wretchedness. At length opened the eventful year of 1534, and Henry learnt that excommunication was hanging over him - that a struggle for life or leath had commenced — and that the imperial armies were preparing to strike in the quarrel. From that time onward the King of England became a new man. Hitherto he had hesitated, temporized, de- Hoay layed - not with Ireland only, but with the manifold labours which were thrust upon him. At last he was awake. And, indeed, it was high time. With a religious war apparently on the eve of explomion, he could ill tolerate a hotbed of sedition at his door; and Irish sedition was about to receive into itself a new element, which was to make it trebly dangerous.

4 State Papers, Vol. II. p. 192.

, 1

Until that moment the disorders in Ireland had arisen recordered out of a natural preference for anarchy. Every man's hand was against his neighbour, and the clans made war on each other only for revenge and plunder and the wild delight of the game. These private quarrels were now to be merged in a single cause — a cause which was to lend a fresh atimulus to their hatred of England, and was at once to create and consecrate a national Irish spirit.

The Irish were eminently Catholic; not in the high sense of the word, - for "the noble folk" could "oppress and spoil the prelates of the Church of Christ of their possessions and liberties" without particular scruple,1 - but the country was covered with churches and monasteries in a proportion to the population far beyond what would have been found in any other country in Europe; and there are forms of superstition which can walk hand in hand with any depth of crime, when that superstition is provided with a talisman which will wash away the stains of guilt. The love of fighting was inherent, at the same time, in the Celtic nature. Ands to the Irists a And such a people, when invited to indulge ready-made their humour in the cause of the church, were an army of insurrection ready made to the hands of the popes, the value of which their Holinesses were not slow to learn, as they have not been quick to forget.3

Henry was aware of the correspondence of Desmond with the emperor. He, perhaps, also expected that the fiction might be retorted upon him (as it actually was)

¹ State Papers, Vol. III. p. 10.

It is remarkable that, as I believe, there is no instance of the act of hereby having been put in force in Ireland. The Irish Protestant church counts many martyrs but they were martyrs who fell by marder in the later measurers. So far as I can learn, no Protestant was over tried and executed there by form of law.

which had been invented to justify the first conquest of the island. If Ireland was a fief of the pope, the same power which had made a present of it to Henry II. might as justly take it away from Henry VIII.; and the peril of his position roused him at length to an effort. It was an effort still clogged by fatality, and less than the emergency required: but it was a beginning, and it was something.

In February, 1534, a month before Clement pronounced his sentence, the Earl of Kildare was February Ridare a required, for the third and last time, to appear ward sine and answer for his offences; and a third time lingual. he ventured to obey. But England had become a changed world in the four years which had passed since his last presence there, and the brazen face and fluent lips were to serve him no more. On his ar- Kalere le rival in London he was sent to the Tower, Tower. and discovered that he had overstepped his limits at last. He was now shrewd enough to see that, if a revolt was contemplated, no time was to be lost. He must play his last card, or his influence was gone for ever. Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, his eldest Lord Thomas son, who in his boyhood had resided in Eng- who deputy. land, had been left as vice-deputy in his father's The earl before his departure had taken precautions to place the fortresses of the pale, with the arms and ammunition belonging to the government, in the hands of dependents whom he could absolutely trust. No sooner was his arrest known than, in compliance with secret instructions which had been left with them, or were sent from England, his friends determined upon rebellion.8

¹ 26 Hen. V.III. cap. 1. Irish statutes.

Cowley to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 198.

Fact or Attainder of the Earl of Kildare- 28 Hen VIII cap. 1. Top

The opportunity was well chosen. The government of Ireland was in disorder. Skeffington was designed for Kildare's successor, but he was not yet appointed; nor was he to cross the Channel till he had collected a atrong body of troops, which was necessarily a work of time. The conditional excommunication of the king was then freshly published; and counsels, there is reason to think, were guiding the Irish movement, which had originated in a less distempered brain than that of an Irish chieftain. Rumours were flying in the southern counties in the middle of June that a Spanish in-June. The emperor vasion might be immediately looked for, and agent to the the emperor's chaplain was with the Earl of Desmond. His mission, it was said, was to prepare the way for an imperial army; and Desmond himself was fortifying Dungarvan, the port at which an invading force could most conveniently land. There is, therefore, a strong probability that Charles V., who had undertaken to execute the papel sentence in the ext is explicit that the rebellion was in consequence of Kilders discovering that the king would not again trust him; and that he had excelely prepared for it before he left Ireland.

1 Cork and Waterfired continued loyal. The mayor of the latter place wrote, on the 12th of July, to Cromwell as follows: " This instant day, report is made by the Vicar of Dungaryan, that the emperous hath cent cortain letters unto the Earl of Deamond, by the same chaptain or ambasisdor that was sent to James the late earl. And the common bruit is, that his practice in to win the Genaltynes and the Breezen; and that the emperour intendeth shortly to send an army to invade the crises and towas by the see means of this land. This thing was spoken by a Speniard more than a month agone to one of the inhabitents of this city; and because I thought It then somewhat incredible, I forbare at that time to write unto your wieflors thereof. The chapitals arrived more than fifteen days past at the Drugle, in the dominion of the said Earl, which Earl hath, for the victual-Ling of his castle of Dungarvan, taken a ship charged with Specials wines, that was bound to the town of Galway; and albeit that his years requireth quistiness and rest, yet intendeth he as much trouble as ever did my of his hation." — William Wise, Mayor of Waterford, to Cromwell, July 13. 1464: Binte Papere, Vol. II. p. 198.

course of the summer, was looking for the most vulner. able point at which to strike; and, not venturing to invade England, was encouraging an Irish rebellion, with a view to following up his success if the commencement proved auspicious.1

Simultaneously with the arrival of these unwelcome

3 On the Stat of July, O'Brien of Thomsond wrote the following character sie letter to Charles: -- Owny O'Brien, Prince of Ireland, to the Empirer Charles V. 44 July 22, 1484.

"To the most excred and most invincible Count, Charles Emperer of the Runans, Most Catholic King of Spain, health with all submission - Most pacred Cones, hed most element, we give your Majesty to know that our producessars for a long time questly and passofully accupied freland, with ausstancy, force, and courage, and without rebullion. They preceded and governed this country in measur 1974, as by our nacional chronicles doth plainly appear. Our said predecesses and anosstry did come from your Majorty a realm of Spain, where they were of the blood of a Spanish prince, and many Kings of that lineage, in long occorrous, governed all Ireland happily, until it was conquered by the English. The last King of this lend was of my blood and name; and ever smor that time our uncenters. and we carrely us, have cassed not to appear the English introders we have mover been subject to English rule, or yolded up our ancient rights and libertue; and there is at this present, and for ever will be, perpetus; descord between us, and we will harms them with continual war.

"For this cours, we, who tall this present, have sworn facilty to no man, exhank ourselves, our lands, our families, our followers, to the protection gad defence of your Majorty, and of free will and deliberate purpose we proming to obey your Majesty's orders and commands in all house hehous. We will serve your Majusty with all our ferou; that is to say, with 1860 horse and 2040 feet, accupyed and armed. Further, we will levy and direct for your Majorty's use 19,000 men, well armed with harquebook, hows, arrows, and awards. We will submit to your Majorty's will and jurgediction more than a hundred castles, and they and all also shall be at your Majesty's disposition to be supjeyed as you shall direct.

"We can undertake also for the nesistance and support of our good prother the Earl of Desmond, where cousin, the daughter of the late Earl

James, your Majouty's friend, is our wife.

"Our further passure will be declared to you by our survants and Monda, Robert and Dominic de Paul, to whom your Majorty will dough to give erodonen. May your Majorty be ever prosperous.

" Written at our Costle of Cinro, witness, our daughter, July 91, 1864.

by your humbic corvent and unfailing friend,

" Court O'Besser, Prince of Indeed."

- MS. Archives at Bransels: The Pilgran, pp. 176, 178.

news, the English government were informed by letters from Dublin, that Lord Thomas Fitzgerald had Lord Thomas Mageneta thrown off his allegiance, and had committed processors Henry acinfinite murders, burnings, and robbings in the eumad, and galle on tipe English pale; making " his avaunt and boast connitty to that he was of the pope's sect and band, and that him he would serve, against the king and all his partakers; that the King of England was accursed, and as many as took his part." The signal for the explosion was given with a theatrical bravado suited to the novel dignity of the cause. Never before had an Irish massacre been graced by a papal sanction, and it was necessary to mark the occasion by unusual form. young lord, Silken Thomas, as he was called, was twenty-one years old, an accomplished Irish cavalier. He was vice-deputy, or so he considered himself: and unwilling to tarnish the honour of his loyal house by any action which could be interpreted into treachery, he commenced with a formal surrender of his office.

and a declaration of war. On the eleventh of June the council were sitting in St. Mary's about the state abbey, when a galloping of horses was heard, and Lord Thomas, at the head of a hundred and forty of the young Geraldines, dashed up to the gate, and springing off his horse, strode into the assembly. The council rose, but he ordered them to ait still, and taking the award of state in his hand, he spoke in Irish to the following effect:—

"However injuriously we be handled, and forced to defend ourselves in arms, when neither our service, nor our good meaning towards our prince's crown availeth, yet say not hereafter, but in this open hostility which we profess here, and proclaim, we have showed ourselves no villains nor churls, but warriors and gen- tlemen. This sword of state is yours, and not mine; I received it with an oath and have used it to your benefit. I should offend mine honour if I turned the same to your annoyance. Now I have need of mine own sword which I dare trust. As for this common sword, it flattereth me with a golden scabbard; but it hath in it a pest lent edge, and whetteth itself in hope of a destruction. Save yourselves from us, as from open enemies. I am none of Henry's deputy; I am his foe; I have more mind to conquer than to govern, to meet him in the field than to serve him in office. If all the hearts of England and Ireland that have cause thereto would join in this quarrel, as I trust they will, then should he be a byword, as I trust he shall, for his heresy, lechery, and tyranny; wherein the ago to come may score him among the ancient princes of most abominable and hateful memory"1 that," says Campion, "he rendered up his sword, adding to his shameful oration many other slanderous and foul terms."

¹ Ownley to Cremwell: Blate Papers, Vol. 11. p. 198.

Cromer, Lord Chancellor and Archbishop of Arnagh, a creature of Kildare, "more like his parish priest or chaplain, than king's chancellor," who had been prepared beforehand, rose, and affected remonstrance; but, speaking in English, his words were not understood by the crowd. A bard in the Geraldina train cut short his speech with an Irish battle chant; and the wild troop rushed, shouting, out of the abbey, and galloped from the town.

In these mock heroics there need not have been anything worse than folly; but Irish heroism, like

* Blate Payers, Vol. II. p. 168

¹ Campion's History of Ireland, p. 175. Leland, Vol. II. p. 143.

Irish religion, was unfortunately limited to words and feelings. The generous defiance in the cause Pillings and of the Catholic faith was followed by pillage and murder, the usual accompaniments of Irish insurrection, as a sort of initial holocaust to propitiate The open country was at the mercy of the anccess. Fitzgerald, joined by O'Connor, proceeded to rebels. The people of awear-in all such of the inhabitants of the pale as would unite against England; promsing protection if they would consent, but inflicting fire and sword wherever he met refusal. The unfortunate people, warned by experience that no service was worse requited in Ireland than loyalty, had no spirit to resist. The few who were obnoxions were killed; the remainder submitted; and the growing com was destroyed, and the farms were burnt, up to the gates of Dublin, that when the English army arrived, they might find neither food to maintain, nor houses to shelter them.1 The first object of Fitzgerald, however, was to seize Dublin itself, where a portion of the citizens were in his favour. week in July he appeared with his followers under the walls; a small force which had attempted to resist was defeated and driven in ; and, under a threat of burning the city, if he was refused, he demanded the surrender of town and castle. The danger was imme-The provident treachery of Kildare, in stripping the castle of its stores and cannon, had made defence all but impossible. Ormond was far off, and weeks must pass before relief could arrive from Eng-Sir John White, an English gentleman, with a handful of men-at-arms, had military command of the city; and the Archbishop of Armagh implored him to have pity on the citizens, and not to expose them to the consequences of a storm.\(^1\) White was are the top too stout a soldier to listen to such timid blooms into the stout a soldier to listen to such timid blooms into the stout white, counsels; yet his position was one of extreme to some white the summander, difficulty; his little garrison was too weak top with commander, to defend the lines of the town, without the assistance of the citizens, and the citizens were divided and dispirited. He resolved at length to surrender the city, and defend the castle to the last. Fitzgerald threatened that he would hold the townsmen responsible for the submission of the troops; but, savage as the English commander knew him to be, he calculated, with justice, that he would not ruin his popularity by cutting the throats of an unresisting crowd.

¹ Unexas Fingles to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. 11. p. 206.

Hastily gathering together sufficient stores to enable him to hold out for a few weeks, and such white wararms and ammunition as could be collected city, and in the emergency, White withdraw into the withdraws fortress, taking with him the Master of the tie-Rolls, the Chief Baron, and such other of the council as desired to be his companions. The inhabitants of Dublin were then empowered to make terms with the rebels. The gates were opened on Fitzgerald's promise to respect life and property, the city was occupied, and siege was immediately laid to the castle. Step of the This was on the 27th of July. The morning July 27. which followed was marked by one of those atrocities which have so often unfortunately distinguished Irish rebellions. Archbishop Allon, to whose ex- Archbishop ertions the exposure of Kildare's proceed-descent to ings had been principally due, either fear- England. ing the possible consequences to himself if the castle was taken, as the Irish writers say," or more probably to hasten in person the arrival of the deputy and his troops, instead of remaining with White, volunteered to cross to England; and before the gates were opened, he went on board a vessel and dropped down the river. He had placed himself unknowingly in the hands of traitors, for the ship was commanded by a Geraldine,1 and in the night which followed was run rate as fore at Contact. aground at Clontarf, close to the mouth of the Liffey. The country was in possession of the insurgents, the crew were accomplices, and the stranded vessel, on the retreat of the tide, was soon surrounded. The arch-bishop is The archbishop was partly persuaded, partly baken to the compelled to go on shore, and was taken by two dependents of the Earl of Kildare to a farm house in the village of Artayne. Here he was permitted to retire to bed; but if he slept, it was for an early and a cruel wakening. The news of his capture was carried to Fitzgerald, who was then in the city, but a few miles distant, and the young lord, with three of his uncles, was on the spot by daybreak. They entered the house and ordered Allen to be brought before them. The archbishop was dragged from his bed; and in his shirt as he was, bare-legged and bare-headed, he dropt upon his knees, and begged for mercy. As well might the sheep have asked mercy of the famished wolf. He had but time to And muttfated. bequeath his soul to heaven, and his skull was cloven as he knelt; and, to make clean work, his chaplains, his servants, all of English blood who were with him, were slaughtered over his body.3 Such was the pious offering to God and holy church on which the

¹ Agard to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 244.

^{*} Loland, Vol. 1f. p. 145.

¹ Leland, Vol. II. p. 145.

Act of Attainder of the Earl of Kildare. 28 Henry Vill. cap. 1. The Frier of Kilmuinham to Henry VIII.: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 501. Comption, p. 178

mn looked down as it rose that fair summer's morning over Dublin Bay; and such were the men whose cause the Mores and the Fishers, the saintly monks of the Charterhouse and the holy martyrs of the Catholic faith, believed to be the cause of the Almighty Father of the world.

The morning's work was still but half completed To massacre a heretic archbishop was a meri- Pitagorald torious, or at least a venial act; but it was pope and the desirable that an opinion in favour of it should amounts be pronounced by authority; or that the guilt, his exploit. if guilt there was, should be washed off without delay. The Archdeacon of Kells,1 therefore, was despatched to the pope and to the emperor, to press the latter to send assistance on this happy success, and to bring back absolution from his Holiness.2 if the murder required it. The next object was to prevent news from reaching England before the castle should be taken. Blockade of The river was watched, the timely assistance Dublin Bay. of an English pirate enabled Fitzgerald to blockade the bay; and Dublin was effectively sealed. But the report of the murder spread rapidly through Ireland. In three days it was known at Waterford; and the Prior of Kilmainham, who had taken refuge The Prior of there, crossed into Wales on the instant, in-Kilmalaham crosses with tending to ride post to London.4 He was the name from Waterdelayed at St. David's by an attack of paral- ford. vsis; but he sent forward a companion who had left

² Call McGravyll, or Charles Reynolds: Act of Attainder, 23 Henry VIII. c. 1. Campion, p. 176.

² Such, at least, one of Fitzgernid's attendants, who was present at the murder, understood to be one of the objects of the architector's memor. (Bittle Papers, Vol. II p. 901, note.) The act (I attainder says marrly that he was sant to beg for assistance.

[•] Rewson, one of the Irish Council.

⁶ Btate Papers, Vol. II. p. 201.

Ireland with him; and the death of the archbishop was made known to Henry in the second week in August.

If Skeffington could set out on the instant, the castle might be saved, and Dublin recovered. Couriers were despatched to urge him to make haste; and others were sent to Ireland to communicate with Ormond, and, if possible, with the party in the castle. But Skeffington, who was too old for his work, Refunction is had loitered over his preparations, and was not ready; and the delay would have been fatal, excapt for the Earl of Ormand, the loyalty of whose noble house at that crisis alone saved the English authority in Ireland. On the arrival of Henry's courier, he collected his people and invaded Kildare. Ormond in-The country was unenclosed — not a fence nor a hedge broke the broad surface of moor and meadow, save where at intervals a few small patches were enclosed for corn crops. Infinite herds of cattle grazed at will over the expanse of pasture, and these cattle were the chief dependence of the people. Ormond, by the suddenness of his inroad, and the absence of the owners, was enabled to sweep clear the whole tract which was occupied by the Geraldines; and Fitzgerald was forced to retire from Dublin to Pleageraid to Seroid to redefend or recover his property. He left a detachment in the city, to prevent the troops in the castle from obtaining supplies,1 and then hurried off to revenge the foray. Entering Carlow, he took a castle on the Slaney, and murdered the garrison. Thence he turned towards Kilkenny, and was bearing down upon Ormond with a strength which it He ettern Drawed. would have been hard for the Butlers to resist, when he learnt that the citizens of Dublin, encouraged by the news that an English army was actually coming, had repented of their patriotism, and, The estimate to earn their pardon from Henry, had closed their pattern to their pardon from Henry, had closed their gates, and had seized and imprisoned altegrated the party who were left before the castle. The prize for which he had played so deeply was slipping from his hands at the moment when it was all but won. He was forced to return in haste; but before the extension of the left Kilkenny, he made an effort to induce the computation of the left Kilkenny, he made an effort to induce the earl would assist him in driving out the English, he would take him as his father," that he would make a present to his son, Lord James, of half the inheritance of the Kildares, and that they two should together rule Iroland.

3 Lehand, Vol. 1L p. 166.

Promises when extorted by presence of danger from a Geraldine were of indifferent value; but if Fitzgerald's engagements had been as sure as they were false and fleeting, they would have weighed little with this gallant old nobleman. Ormond replied, that, Ormond's if the rebels would lay down their arms and "plysue for mercy, they might perhaps find it; but for himself, " if his country were wasted, his castles won or prostrate, and himself exiled, yet would be never shrink to persevere in his duty to the king to the death." $ Failing here, and having at the same time received a check in a skirmish, Fitzgerald next endeavoured to gain time. The Irish clans were gathering, but they were still at a distance, and his own presence was instantly required elsewhere. He offered a truce, therefore; and to this Ormond, being hard pressed by the

Ibit. Campion, pp. 177, 178.

Instructions to Welter Cowley to be declared to the King's Highness in behalf of the Earl of Ossory: Butta Papers, Vol. II. p. 250.

Earl of Desmond, was ready to consent. But it was only treachery. Ormond broke up his camp, Pitagovsidⁱe truchery and his people were scattered; and within three days, O'Neile having joined Fitzgerald, he was taken at a disadvantage; his son, Lord James, was severely wounded; and a cordon of Irish being drawn round him, to prevent him from relieving Dublin, the rebel army hastened back to renew the siege.1 again ha-rieged. They had the cannon with them which Kildare had taken from the castle, but were happily illprovided with ammunition, or resistance would have been desperate. The siege opened at the be-September. ginning of September. The month passed away, and the place was still untaken. If the deputy would only arrive, there was still time to save Ekvilogioù does not arit. Each hour he was looked for, yet through these priceless days he was loitering at Beaumaris. From the fatality which has for ever haunted the dealings of English statesmen with Ireland, an old man past work, weak in health, and with all the moral deficiencies of a failing constitution, had been selected to encounter a dangerous rebellion. The insurrection had broken out in June; every moment was precious, the loss of a day might be the loss of the whole country; yet it was now the fourth of October; the ships were loaded; the horses were on board; they had been on board a fortnight, and were sickening from confinement. The wind was fair, at "The rebel hierly trusteth in his ordnance, which he hath of the king's."

Alien to Cromwell: Bad in 202

- Alien to Cromwell: Ibid. p. 202.

¹ M'Morrough, O'More, O'Connor, O'Bren, in September, with the greatest part of the gentlemen of the county of Kildare, were retained and tet at Carlow, Castledermot, Athye, Kilken, and thereabout, with victualle during three weeks, to resist the Earl of Omory from invading of the county of Kildare.—State Papers, Vol. II. p. 251.

that critical season of the year a matter of incalculable importance. Yet Skeffington was still "not orment ready." 1 All would have been lost but for Duolia. the Earl of Ormand. The city was at the last extremity, when he contrived to force his way through the Irish into Kildare; he again laid waste the country, and destroyed the newly-gathered harvests.2 On the 14th of October Fitzgerald was forced finally Stated Date to raise the siege, that his followers might save October 14. the remaint of their property from destruction. relief was but just in time, for the resources of Dublin were exhausted. Before retreating, the rebel lord exacted from the corporation an engagement that at the end of six weeks they should either have procured his pardon from the king, with the deputation of Ireland for his life, or else should surrender the city. For the fulfilment of these insolent terms he took as pledges sixteen of the children of the most important families of the city, with three of the corporation themselves.

And now, at length, on the same 14th of October, the English anchors were finally raised, and The Region the deputy, with Sir William Brereton and less. Sir John Salisbury, several hundred Northumberland

Allen, Master of the Rells, had gone over to quicken his sluggish movements, and wrote from Chester to Cromwell, in despair: "rlease your goodness to be advertised, that as yet the deputy is at Beaumaris, and the Northern men's herree have been on shipboard these twelve days, which is the danger of their destruction. They have lost such a wind and fair weather, as I doubt they shall not have again for this winter season. Mr. Brereton (Sir William Brereton, Skafington's second in command) lieth here at the rea side in a readment. If their first appointment to Dublia had been kept, they might have been there, but now they tarry to pass with the deputy. Sir, for the love of God, let some aid be sent to Dublin; for the loss of that city and the castle were the plant subversion of the land"—Allen to Cromwell, Oct & State Papare, Vol. 11 p. 209.

Instructions to Walter Cowley on buhalf of the Earl of Ossery. Ibid.

Sir William Braraton to Henry VIII: Ibid p. 204
 voz.- vz. 19

horse trained in the Border wars, and a number not specified, but probably from two to three thousand archers and men-at-arms,1 were under way. Whether the blame of the delay lay with the incompetency of Skeffington, or the contempt of the English, which would not allow them to make haste into the presence of an enemy who never dared to encounter them in the field, but carried on war by perjury, and pillage, and midnight murder - whatever the cause was, they were at length on their way, and, through the devotion of Ormand, not too late to be of use.

The fleet crossed the Channel in a single night, and the next morning were under Lambay Isl-Тину сточ In a single and,2 where they had run in for shelter. Here news was brought them that Dublin Castle was taken. They did not believe it; but a council of war was held, and Skeffington resolved bay Island. that for himself he might not risk the attempt to land: Brereton and Salsbury might try it, if they could do so "without casting themselves away"; the deputy would go on to Waterford with the body of the army, and join Sir John St. Loo, who had crossed to that port in the week preceding, from Bristol.

Accordingly, on the morning of the 17th of October, Sir William Brereton, with five hundred with 600 men, saired into the mouth of the Liffey; and running up the river, instead of an enemy drawn up to oppose his landing, he found the mayor and corporation waiting at the quay, with drums, and flags, and trumpets to welcome him as a deliverer.*

¹ Two thousand five hundred was the smallest number which Lord Surrey previously mentioned as sufficient to do good. - State Papers, Vel. II. p. 73.

Fifteen miles north of Dublin; immediately off Malahida.

⁸ Sir William Recreton and Sir John Salisbury to Henry VIII : State Papers, Vol. III p. 908.

Skeffington was less successful; he remained under Lambay waiting for a wind for Waterford, and in the meantime Fitzgerald, hearing of the arrival of the fleet, was in force upon the hills overlooking the anchorage. The English commander, though An English aware that the insurgents were in the neighbourhood, allowed himself, with extreme improdence, to land a detachment of troops, with directions to march to Dublin. He himself went with the fleet to the Skerries, where he conceived. under false information, that a party of the rebels were lying. He found nothing there but a few fishingboats; and while he was engaged in burning these. Fitzgerald attacked the division watch had been sent on shore, and cut them off to a man. Nor was this the only misfortune. The pirate ships which had been watching Dublin Bay hovered round the fleet, cutting off straggling transports; and although one of them was chased and driven on shore, the small success poorly counterbalanced the injury which had been inflicted.

1 A small harbour near Drogheda.

Skeffington was prudestly reserved in his report of these things to Henry. He mentions having set a party on shore, but says nothing of their having been destroyed; and he could not have been ignorant of their this, for he was writing three weeks after it, from Dublin. He was ellent, too, of the injury which he had received from the piretes, though elequent on the boats which he burnt at the Skerrice. - State Papers, Vol. 11. p. 106. On first reading Skudington's desputch, I had supposed that the "brilliant victory" claimed by the Irish historians (see Leland, Yel. If. p. 148) must have been imaginary. The Irish Statute Book, however, is too explicit to allow of such a hope. "He [Fitzgereld, not only fortif ed and manned divers ships at see, for keeping and letting, destroying and taking the king's deputy, errsy, and subjects, that they should not land within the said land, but also at the arrival of the said army the same Thomas, accompanied with his uncles, servents, adherents, &c., falsely and traitorously assembled themse'ves together upon the sea coast, for keeping and resisting the king's deputy and army; and the same time they shamefully murdered divers of the said army coming to land. And Edward

After a week of this trifling, Skeffington consented to resign his intention of going to Waterford, October 21. Skellington and followed Brereton into Dablin. made la Doblin, he had delayed a lay after discovering that the river and the city were open to him, it is impossible But his presence was of little benefit. to conjecture. and only paralysed his abler subordinates. As soon as he had brought his army into the city, he conceived that he had done as much as the lateness of the season. would allow. The November weather having set in wild and wet, he gave up all thought of active measures till the return of spring; and do nothing he wrote to inform the king, with much selfapprobation, that he was busy writing letters to the Irish chiefs, and making arrangements for a better government; that Lord Thomas Fitzgerald had been proclaimed traitor at the market-cross; and that he hoped, as soon as the chancellor and the vicar-general could come to an understanding, the said traitor might be pronounced excommunicated.\(^1\) All this was very well, and we learn to our comfort that in due time the excommunication was pronounced; but it was not putting down the rebellion - it was not the work for which he was sent to Ireland with three thousand English soldiers.

Fitzgerald, as soon as the army was landed, retired into the interior; but finding that the deputy hums Twin lay idle within the walls, he recovered heart, boyne, with and at the head of a party of light horse resort Dublin. appeared within six miles of Dublin. Trim and Dunboyne, two populous villages, were sacked Rowkes, pirate at the esa, captain to the said Thomas, destroyed and took many of them."—Act of Attainder of the Earl of Kildare: 28 Hen VIII cap. 1.

Skedlington to Henry VIII.: Stats Papers, Vol. II. pt. 206, 207.

seen from the battlements of the Castle. Yet neither the insults of the rebels nor the entreaty of the inhabitants could move the imperturbable Skeffington. He lay still within the city walls; I and Fitzgerald, still further encouraged, despatched a fresh party the arche of ecclesiastics to the pope and the emperor, writer to the with offers of allegiance and promises of tribute, I giving out meanwhile in Ireland that he would be supported in the spring or summer by the long talked-of Spanish army. Promises costing Charles V. nothing, he was probably liberal of them, and waited for the issue to decide how far they should be observed.

If this was so, the English deputy seemed to be determined to give the rebellion every chance of issuing as the emperor desired. The soldiers were eager for employment, but Skeffington refused to give his officers an opportunity for distinction in which he did not share,² and a few ineffectual skirmishes in the neighbourhood were the sole exploits which for five months they were allowed to achieve. One expedition, as far Accompanied with the number of sixty or eighty horsemen, and about three hundred kerns and gallowglass, the traitor came to the lown of Trim, and there not only robbed the same, but also burnt a great part thereof and took all the cattle of the country thereshouts; and after that amaging! Dunboyne, within all miles to Dublin; and the inhabitants of the town defending thomselves by the space of two days, and sending for succour to Dublin. . . . in default of robes, be attendy destroyed and burnt the whole town. — Allen to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. II p. 290.

^{*} He hath sent divers muniments and precedents which should prove that the king held this land of the Sec of Rome; alledging the king and his realise to be heretice digressed from the obedience of the same, and of the faith Catholic. Wherefore his desire is to the emperour and the Bishop of Rome, that they will aid him in defence of the faith Catholic aga ast the king, promising that he will held the said land of them, and any tribute for the name yearly. — Ibid. p. 222-

My lord deputy descreth so much has own glory, that he work to was should make an enterprise except he were at it. — Had. p. 227.

as Drogheda, the deputy indeed ventured, towards the end of November; and in the account of it Skellagton won tu rea an which he sent to England, he wrote as if it espulition to Drogheda, were matter of congratulation that he had and brings back the brought his army back in safety. Nor were menty in his congratulations, at least to himself, without reason, for he owed that safety to God and to for-He had allowed the archers to neglect the ckl precaution of taking cases for their bows. They were overtaken by a storm, which wetted the strings and loosened the feathers of the arrows; and thus, at disadvantage, they were intercepted in a narrow defile,1 and escaped only because the Irish were weak in numbers.

He excused himself for his shortcomings on the pleathat he was in had health — an adequate apology for his own inaction, but none for his the ground appointment on a service so dangerous. Yet perhaps his failure is explained by the scene of it. Elsewhere, Sir William Skeffington may have been a gallant soldier and a reasonable man; but the fatal atmosphere of Ireland seems at all times to have had a power of prostrating English intellect. The Protector Cromwell alone was cased in armour which could defy its enchantments. An active officer might have kept the field without difficulty. The Master of the Rolls, to prove that the country, even in mid-winter, was practicable without danger, rode to Waterford in November with only three hundred horse, through the heart of the disturbed districts, and returned unmolested. The Earl of Ossory, with Sir John St. Loo, made an appointment to meet Skeffington at Kilcan.

2 Allow to Crosswell: Ibid. p. 290.

Skeffington to Sir Edmund Walsingham: State Papers, Vol. II p. 205

In Kilders county, on the frontiers of the puls.

where, if he brought cannon, they might recover the castles of the government which were held by the Geraldines. He promised to go, and he might have done so without danger or difficulty; but he neither went nor sent; only a rumour came that the deputy vas ill; I and in these delays and with this octentation of imbecility, the winter passed away, as if to convince every wavering Irishman that, strong as the English might be in their own land, the sword dropped from their nerveless hands when their feet were on Irish soil. Nor was this the only or the worst consequence. The army, lying idle in Dublin, grew dis- consessor organized; many of the soldiers deserted; and systemics. an impression spread abroad that Henry, after all, intended to return to the old policy, to pardon Fitzgerald, and to restore him to power.1

The clear pen of the indefatigable Allen lays the state of affairs before us with the most painful distinctness. "My lord deputy," he wrote to

I The captume and I, the Rarl (of Omory) directed letters to the deputy to meet us in the county of Kildara, at Kucaa, bringing with him ordnance accordingly, when the deputy apporated without fail to meet. At which day and place the said Earl, with the army (of) Waterford field not to be, and there did abide three days continually for the deputy, where he, anither any of the army, same not, we say letter or word was had from hims but only that Bir James Fitzgerald told that he heard say he was alck.— Descry to W. Cowley: Savie Popers, Vol. II. p. 251.

Allen certainly thought so, or at least was unable to assure hisself that it was not so. "My susple advice shall be," he wrote, "that if even the king intend to show him grace (which himself demandeth not in duaments) and to perdon him, to withdraw his charges and to perdon him out of sand, or also to send hither a procumation under the Great Seal of England, that the bing never intends to pardon him no may that shall take part with him, but utterly to procedute both him and them to their utter confusion. For the gentlemen of the country hath end plantly to divers of the council that until this he done, they dare not be earnest in resisting him, in death, he should have he pardon haranter, as his grandfather, he being, and divers his ancestow have had; and then would procedute thou by the mans." — State Property, Vol. 11 p. 292.

Cromwell on the 16th of February, "now by the space of twelve or thirteen weeks hath continued in aickness, never once going out of his house; he as yet is not recovered. In the meantime the rebel hath burnt much of the country, trusting, if he may be suffered, to waste and desolate the Inglishry, [and thus] to enforce this army to depart. Sirs, as I heretofore advertised you, this rebel had been banished out of all these parts or now, if all men had done their duties. But, to be plain with you, except there be a marshal appointed, which must do strait correction, and the army prohibited from resorting to Dublin (but ordered to keep the field), the king shall never be well served, but his purpose shall long be delayed." 1

The wages, also, were ill-paid, though money in abundance had been provided. The men were mutinous, and indemnified themselves at the expense of the wretched citizens, whose houses they pillaged at will under pretence that the owners were in league with the rebels. The arms, resolution also, which had been supplied to the troops, were of the worst kind: they had been furnished out of ordnance which had been long on hand, and were worthless.

The conduct of the king, when the representations of Allen were laid before him, was very unlike what the

Allen to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 924.

^{*} Restraint must be had that this army shall not spell us rob any persen, but as the deputy and council shall appoint; and that the captales be shedient to their orders, or it shall not be well. No it is not meet that every soldier shall make a man a tractor for to have his goods. They be so must alled in this rebbery, that now they almost will not go forth to defend the country, except they may have gain." — Allen to tremwell, Peb. 16.

^{* &}quot;The bows which came out of the stores at Ludlew Castle were naught; many of them would not hold the bending." — Sode Papers, Vol. 11, p. 228.

popular conception of his character would have led us to expect. We imagine him impatient and irritable: and supposing him to have been (as he certainly was) most anxious to see the rebellion crushed, we should have looked for some explosion of temper; or, at least, for some imperious or arbitrary message to the unfortunate deputy. He contented himself, however, with calmly sending some one whom he could trust to make inquiries; and even when the result confirmed the language of the Master of the Rolls, and The Idea. the deputy's recal was in consequence urged are the most of Stelling. upon him, he still refused to pass an affront too.
The king upon an old servant. He appointed Lord referent. Leonard Grey, brother-in-law of the Countess of Kildare, chief marshal of the army; but he would not even send Grey over till the summer, and he left Skeffington an opportunity of recovering his reputation in the campaign which was to open with the spring. The army, however, was ordered to leave The army Dublin without delay; and the first move, ned com which was made early in February, was followed by immediate fruits. Two of the pirates who had been acting with Fitzgerald were taken, and hanged.⁴ Several other offenders of note were also eaught and thrown into prison; and in two instances, as if the human ministers of justice had not been sufficiently prompt, the higher powers thought fit to inflict the necessary punishment. John Teling, one of the archbishop's murderers, died of a foul disorder at Maymosth: and the Earl of Kildare, the contriver of the whole mischief, closed his evil career in the Tower of London "for thought and pain." He was attainted by the parliament which sat in the autumn, and lay under sentence of death when death came unbidden to spare the executioner his labour.

¹ The king, a few months later, wrote to him a letter of warm thanks for his services, and admitted his plea of ill-health with poculiar hindress—Hanny VIII to Sketlington: State Papers, Vol II p. 280.

^{*} Brabason to Gromwell: Ihid. p. 194.

Meantime, the spring opened at last, and affairs further improved. Skeffington's health continued weak; but with the advance of the seas in he was able to take the field; and on the 14th of March he appeared under the walls of Maynooth. This castle was the strongest in the possession of the Geraldines. Vast labour tooth thatis. had been recently expended on its fortifications, for which the king's subjects had been forced to pay. It was defended by the ordnance from Dublin, and held by a small but adequate garrison. It was thought to be impregnable, and in the earlier stages of the science of gunnery it might possibly have defied the ordinary methods of attack. Nay, with a retrospective confidence in the strength of its defences, the Irish historians have been unable to believe that it could have been fairly taken; they insist that it resisted the efforts of the besiegers, and was on the point of being saved by Fitzgerald,2 when it was delivered to the English commander by treachery. A despatch to the king, which was written from the spot, and signed by the deputy and all the members of the Irish council. leaves but little remaining of this romance.

As authentic account of an attack by cannon on a fortified place at that era, will accordly fail to be interesting. The castle, says this document, was so strongly defended both with men and ordnance, "as the like had not been seen in Ireland since the Conquest." The garrison consisted of a hundred men, of which sixty were gunners. On the third day of the siege the English batteries opened on the north-west side of the donjon, and destroying the battlements, buried the cannon on that part of the wall under the ruins. The siege lines were then moved "to the north side of the base court of the cast e. at the north-east end whereof there was a new-made. very strong, and fast bulwark, well garnsoned with men and ordnance." Here a continual fire was sustained for five days, " on that wise that a breach and entry was made there." Whereupon, conbeing Tuesday next before Easter day, there was a galiard assault given before five o'clock in the morning, and the base court entered; at which entry there were slain of the ward of the castle about sixty, and of your Grace's army no more but John Griffin, veoman of your most honourable guard, and six others which were killed with ordnance of the castle at the entry. Howbeit, if it had not pleased God to preserve us, it were to be marvelled that we had no more slain. After the base court was thus won, we assaulted the great castle, which within a while yielded." Thirtyseven of the remaining garrison were taken They was prisoners, with two officers, two Irish eccleviastics who had distinguished themselves in promoting he insurrection, and one of the murderers of the archbishop.

¹ Campion, p. 179.
2 Leland, Cone, Ware.

The place was taken by fair fighting, it seems, without need of treachery; and the capture by storm of a fortified castle was a phenomenon altogether new to the Irish, who had yet to learn the effect of well-served cannon upon walls.¹

¹ Heavy VIII. was one of the first men to foresee and value the rowse

The work at length was begun in earnest, and in order to drive the lesson home into the understanding of the people, and to instruct them clearly that rebellion and murder were not any longer to be tolerated, the prisoners were promptly brought up before the provost-marshal, and twenty-six of them there and then, under the rums of their own den, were hung up for sign to the whole nation.¹

A judicial operation of this kind had never before no reason been witnessed in Ireland within the known of May mostle. The offer too cycle of its history, and the effect of it was it upon the proportionately startling. In the presence people. of this " Pardon of Maynooth," as it was called, the phantom of rebellion vanished on the spot. It was the first serious blow which was struck in the war, and there was no occasion for a second. In a moment the noise and bravado which had roared from Donegal to Cork was hushed into a supplication for forgiveness. Fitzgerald was hastening out of Thomond to the relief of his fortross. When they heard of the execution, Therefolles his army melted from him like a snowdrift. The confederacy of the chiefs was broken up; of artillery. Sebastiani montions experiments on the range of guns which were made by him, in Southampton water a and it is likely that the chanon-used in the riege of Maynooth were the large-sland brass gues which were first cast in England in the year of its capture. - Slow, p. 572. When the history of artiflory is written, Henry V II 's laboure in this department must not be forgotten. Two foreign engineers whom he tempted into his service, first invented " shells." " One Peter Pas ., a Frenchman hore," says Stow, " and another alien, called Peter Van Collen, a guasmith, both the king's feed men, conferring together, devised and canadto be made certain mortar pieces, being at the mouth from eleven inches unto nineteen inches wide, for the one whereof they jaled raised to be made certain hollow shot of east from to be stuffed with fire-work, or wildhre, whereof the bigger sort for the same had screws of iron to receive a match to carry fire kindled, that the firework raight be set on fire for to break to pieces the same bollow shot, whereof the standard piece buttless any man we ald kill or speil him." - Stow, Chromole, p. $84.

1 State Papers, Vol. 11, p. 917.

first one fell away from it, and then another; and before the summer had come, O'Brien of Inchiquin, O'Connor, who had married Fitzgerald's sister, and the few scattered banditti of the Wicklow mountains, were all who remained of the grand association which was to place the Island of Saints at the feet of the Eather of Christendom.

Sadder history in the compass of the world's great hronicle there is none than the history of the Irish: so courageous, yet so like cowards; so interesting, yet so resolute to forfeit all honourable claims to interest. In thinking of them, we can but shake our heads with Lord Chancellor Audeley, when meditating on this rebellion, and repeat after him, "they be a people of strange nature, and of much inconstancy."

Lord Fitzgerald was now a fugitive, with a price upon his head. He retreated into Thomond, Fitzgerald intending to sail for Spain, and to attempt Thomosed, with his own lips to work persuasion with the laterable may for emperor. There was an expectation, however, that the Spaniards might be already on their way; and O'Brien persuaded him to remain, O'Brien pers

There was no danger that he would be betrayed.

The Irish had many faults — we may not making of perfuse them credit for their virtues. However treacherous they were to their enemies, however meanstant in their engagements, uncertain, untrue in ordinary obligations, they were without rivals in the world in their passionate attachments among themselves; and of all the chiefs who fell from Fitzgerald's banner, and hastened with submission to the English deputy, there was perhaps not one who, though steeped in the blood of a hundred murders, would not have been torn limb from limb rather than have listened to a temptation to betray him.

¹ fitate Papers, Vol. 1. p. 446.

⁴ fbid Vol. II. p. 258.

At length, after a narrow escape from a surprise, from which he rescued himself only by the connivance of the Irish kerne who were with the party sent to take him, the young earl, as he now called nimeelf, weary of his wandering life, and when no Spaniards came, seeing that his cause was for the present hopeless, offered to surrender. It was by this tond Leon Leonard Grey, his father's brother-in-law, was present with the him with an army. To him he wrote from O'Connor's Castle, in King's County, apologizing for what he had done, desiring pardon "for his life and lands," and begging his kinsman to interest himself in his behalf. If he could obtain his forgiveness, he promised to deserve it. If it was refused, he said that he "must shift for himself the best that he could."

In reply to this overture, Grey suggested an interery suggested an interture of the Kildare's to high office in Ireland had been determined, we may be sure, by the Geraldine influence in the English council. The marshal was personally acquainted with Fitzgerald, and it is to be observed that the latter in writing to him signed himself his "loving friend." That Lord Leonard was anxious to save him does not admit of a doubt : he had been his father's chief advocate with the king, and Lis natural sympathy with the representative of an ancient and noble house was strengthened by fam ly connexion. He is not to be suspected, therefore, of treachery, at least towards his kinsman. The interview was agreed upon, and on the eighteenth of August, Grey, with Sir Rice Mansell, Chief Justice Aylmer, Lord James Butler, and Sir William St. Loo, rode from Maynooth into King's County, where, on the borders of the Bog of Allen, Fitzgerald met Fitzgerald them. Here he repeated the conditions upon meta him, which he was ready to surrender. Lord Grey said that he had no authority to entertain such conditions; but he encouraged the hope that an unconditional surrender would tell in his favour, and he promised himself to accompany his prisoner to the king's presence. Fitzgerald interpreting expressions confess- And moveedly intended "to allure him to yield," in designations the manner most favourable to himself, placed protes of himself in the bands of the marshal, and rode back with him to the camp.

¹ Lord Thomas Fitzgerald to Lord Loomert Grey: State Papers, Vol. 9, 970.

The deputy wrote immediately to announce the capture. Either the terms on which it had been effected had not been communicated to him, or he thought it prudent to conceal them, for he informed Henry that the traiter had yielded without conditions, either of

I The Lord Leonard repayreth at this season to your Majesty, bringing with him the said Thomas, beseeching your Highness most humbly, that according to the comfort of our words speaks to the same Thomas to affere him to yield him, ye would be merciful to the said Thomas, especially conserving his life.—The Council of Ireland to Henry VIII.: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 275.

pardon, life, lands, or goods, "but only submitting to his Grace's mercy." 1 The truth, however, was soon known; and it occasioned the gravest empositioned. barrassment. How far a government is bound at any time to respect the unauthorized engagements of its subordinates, is one of those intricate questions which cannot be absolutely answered; 2 and it was still less easy to decide, where the object of such engagements had run a career so infamous as Lord if Fitzgerad was spaced, the govern-ment of Ire-land was in-Thomas Fitzgerald. No pirate who ever swung on a well-earned gallows had committed darker crimes, and the king was called upon to grant a pardon in virtue of certain unpermitted hopes which had been held out in his name. He had resolved to forgive no more noble traitors in Ireland. and if the archbishop's murder was passed over, he had no right to affect authority in a country where he was so unable to exert it. On the other hand, the capture of so considerable a person was of great im-You very the English entitled to portance; his escape abroad, if he had dereap the besetts of his sired to leave the country, could not have mapters? been prevented; and while the government retained the benefit which they derived from his surrender, their honour seemed to be involved in observing the conditions, however made, by which it had been secured.

It is likely, though it is not certain, that Lord Leonard foresaw the dilemma in which Henry would be placed, and hoped by means of it to secure the escape-

¹ State Papers, Vol. II p. 274.

The conditions promised to Napoleon by the captain of the Bellevaphon created a similar difficulty. If Nana Sahib had by any chance here connected by marriage with an English officer, and had that officer induced him to surrender by a promise of pardon, would the English Government have proposed that promise?

of his kinsman. His own ultimate treason throws a shadow on his earlier loyalty; and his talent was fully equal to so ingenious a fraud. He had placed the king in a position from which no escape was possible that was not open to grave objection. To pardon so heavy an offender was to violate the first duty of government, and to grant a general licence to Irish criminality; to execute him was to throw a shadow indirectly on the king's good faith, and lay his generals open to a charge of treachery. Henry resolved to err on the side on which error was least injurious. The difficulty was submitted to the Duke of Norfolk, as of most expenence in Irish matters. The duke advised that The Duke of execution should be delayed; but added sig are daily nificantly, "quod defertur non aufertur." - neit. Pardon was not to be thought of; the example would be fatal.! Immediate punishment would injure the credit of Lord Grey, and would give occasion for slander against the council.2 The best course would be to keep "the traitor" in safe prison, and execute him, should it seem good, at a future time. This advice was followed. Fitzgerald, with his uncles, respense to who had all been implicated in the insurrection of the office the tion, was committed to the Tower; and in burn. the year following they were hanged at Tyburn.

So ended the rebellion in Ireland; significant chiefly because it was the first in which an outbreak against England assumed the features of a war of religion, the

TOL II

³ It were the worst example that ever was; and especially for these on gracious people of Ireland. — Norfolk to Gromwell: State Papers, Vol. II. p. 976.

 ¹⁰⁶d.

Ibid. The doke, throughout his letter, taken a remarkably encinemine view of the situation. He does not allow the question of "right" to be raised, or suppose at all that the government could lie under any hind of chigation to a person in the position of Hitagerald.

Google

first which the pope was especially invited to bless, and the Catholic powers, as such, to assist. The features of it, on a narrow scale, were identical with those of the later risings. Fostered by the hesitation of the home authorities, it commenced in bravado and murder; it vanished before the first blows of substantial resistance. Yet the suppression of the insurrection was attended by the usual Irish fatality: mistake and incompleteness followed the proceedings from the beginning to the end; and the consciousness remained that a wound so closed would not heal, that the moral temper of the country remained unaffected, and that the same evils would again germinate.

i "Ty

CHAPTER JX.

THE CATHOLIC MARTYRS.

WHILE the disturbance in Ireland was at its height. affairs in England had been scarcely less criti- State of Rog The arface indeed remained unbroken. Find in the running of The summer of 1534 passed away, and the 1634. threatened invasion had not taken place. The disaffection which had appeared in the preceding year had been smothered for a time; Francis I, held the emperor in check by menacing Flanders, and through French influence the rupture with Scotland had been seemingly healed. In appearance the excommunication had passed off as a brutum fulmen, a flash of harmless sheet lightning, serving only to dazzle feeble eyes. oath of succession, too, had been taken generally through the country; Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher having alone ventured to refuse. The pope had been abjured by the universities and by the convocation in both the provinces, and to these collective acts the bishops and the higher clergy had added each their separate consent.

But the government knew too well the temper of the clergy to trust to outward compliance, or to feel assured that they acquiesced at heart either in the separation from Rome, or in the loss of their treasured privileges. The theory of an Anglican Erastianism found favour with some of the higher church dignitaries, and with a section perhaps of the secular The storgy secupity with the revolupriests; but the transfer to the crown of the tion, but infirst-fruits, which in their original zeal for a wardly have Hatle boart free Church of England the ecclesiastics had hoped to preserve for themselves, the abrupt limitation of the powers of convocation, and the termination of so many time-honoured and lacrative abuses, had interfered with the popularity of a view which might have been otherwise broadly welcomed; and while growing vigorously among the country gentlemen and the middie classes in the towns, among the clergy it throve only within the sunshine of the court. The rest were overawed for the moment, and stunned by the suddenness of the blows which had fallen upon them. As far as they thought at a.l. they believed that the storm would be but of brief duration, that it would pass away as it had risen, and that for the moment they had only The modern Englishman looks back upon the time with the light of after history. He has been inured by three centuries of division to the spectacle of a divided church, and sees nothing in it either embarrassing or fearful. The ministers of a faith which had been for fifteen centuries as the seamless vesture of Christ, the priests of a church supposed to be founded on the everlasting rock against which no power could prevail, were in a very different position. They obeyed for the time the strong hand which was upon them, trusting to the interference of accident or provi-They comforted themselves with the hope that the world would speedily fall back into its old ways, that Christ and the saints would defend the They bond believe the church against sacrilege, and that in the mean bracking to time there was no occasion for them to thrust themselves upon voluntary martyrdom.1 But this position, natural as it was, became difficult to maintain when they were called upon not only themselves to consent to the changes, but to justify their consent to their congregations, and to explain to the people the grounds on which the government had acted. The kingdom was by implication under an interdict," yet the services went on as usual; the king was excommunicated; doubt lung over the succession; the facts were intperfectly known; and the never-resting frame mendicant were busy scattering falsehood and misrepresentation. It was of the highest moment that on all these important matters the mind of the nation should if possible be set at rest; and the clergy, whose loyalty was presumed rather than trusted, furnished the only means by which the government could generally and simultaneously reach the people. The clergy therefore, as we have seen, were called upon for their services; the pope's name was erased the charge from the mass books; the statute of appeals which have and the statute of succession were fixed against the doors of every parish church in England, and the rectors and curates were directed every week in their sermons to explain the meaning of these acts. The hishops were held responsible for the obedience of the

¹ "These be no causes to die for," was the favourite phrase of the time. It was the expression which the Bishop of London used to the Carthusian monks (Historia Martyrum Anglorum), and the Archbishop of York in his diocese generally. — Ellis, third sense, Vol. II. p. 375.

So Rex Prefetus, vel als, inhibitioni as prohibitioni at interdicto hujusmodi contravenerint, Regem ipsum as also numes supraducts, asstentias consums at parameters ex nume proof as tune incursions declarates at at tales publicari as publics numeral et evitari—as Interdiction pur tixum regions. Anglis: sub dictis public observari debers, volumes at a mandamus. — First Brief of Clements Legrand, Vol. III. pp. 451, 452. The Church of Rome, however, draws a distinction between a sentence explied and a sentence directly pressureed.

clergy; the sheriffs and the magistrates has been directed to keep an eye upon the bishops; and all the machinery of centralization was put in force to compel the fulfilment of a duty which was well known to be unwelcome.

That as little latitude as possible might be left for resistance or evasion, books were printed by order of council, and distributed through the hands of the bishops, containing a minute account of the whole proceedings on the divorce, the promises and falsehoods of the pope, the opinions of the European universities, and a general epitome of the course which had been pursued. These were to be read aloud to the congregations; and an order for preaching was at the same time The order for speach-but. Every preacher to deliver one circulated, in which the minuteness of the directions is as remarkable as the prudence of in in an them. Every preacher was to deliver one against the papal marsermon at least ("and after at his liberty") on the encroachments and usurpations of the papal He was to preach against it, to expose and bower. refute it to the best of his ability, and to declare that it was done away, and might neither be obeyed nor defended further. Again in all places " where the king's The arch-his bop's just cause in his matter of matrimony had been detracted, and the incestuous and unjust [matsent-zon to be beid a rimony] had been set forth [and extelled]," thing of the clergy were generally directed "to open not to be again onlied and declare the mere verity and justice" of in question. the matter, declaring it "neither doubtful nor disputable, but to be a tlung of mere verity, and so to be allowed of all men's opinions. They were to relate in detail the pope's conduct, his many declarations in the king's favour; the first decretal, which was withheld Btrype's Messerials, Vol. I. p. 392. Rills, third series, Vol. II. p. 338.

by Campeggio, in which he had pronounced the marriage with Catherine invalid; his unjust avocation of the cause to Rome; his promises to the King of France; and finally, his engagement at Marseilles to pronounce in the King of England's favour, if only he would acknowledge the papal jurisdiction. They were therefore to represent the king's conduct as the just and necessary result of the pope's duplicity. These things the clergy were required to teach, not as matters of doubt and question, but as vital certainties on which no difference of opinion could be tolerated. Finally. there were added a few wholesome admonitions on other subjects, which mark the turning of the tide from Catholic orthodoxy.

The clear are forbidden to preach the preach point of decision. any longer in the polemics of theology. "To keep unity and quietness in the realm it" was " ordained that no preachers" should "contend openly in the pulpit one against another, nor uncharitably deprave one another in open audience. If any of them " were "grieved one with another," they were to "complain to the King's Highness or the archbishop or bishop of the diocese." They were "purely, sincerely, and justly" to "preach the scripture and words of Christ, and not mix them with men's institutions, or make men believe that the force of God's law and man's law was the like." On subjects such as purgatory, wor-

It is remarkable that in this paper it seems to be assumed, that the pape would have fulfilled this engagement if Henry had fully submitted. "He openly confessed," it says, "that our master had the right; but because our prince and master would not projudicate for his jurisdictions, and uphold his usurped power by sending a proctor, ye may evidently here see that this was only the cause why the judgment of the Bishop of Rome was not given in his favour; what by it may appear that there lacked not any justice in our prince's cause, but that ambitues, vain glory, and too much mundanity were the lets thereof."

thip of saints and relics, marriage of the clergy, justification by faith, pilgrimages and miracles, they were to keep silence for one whole year, and not to preach at al.

These instructions express distinctly the convictions of the government. It would have been well if the clergy could have accepted them as they were given, and submitted their understandings once for all to statesmen who were wiser than themselves. The majority (of the parish clergy at least) were perhaps outwardly obedient; but the surveillance which the magistrates were directed to exercise proves that the exceptions were expected to be extensive; and in many quarters punctury of these precautions themselves were rapidly securing to discovered to be inadequate. Several even of Observed the most trusted among the bishops attempted an obstructive resistance. The clergy of the north were notoriously disobedient. The Archbishop of York was reported to have talked loosely of " standing against" the king "unto death." " The Bishop of Durham fell under suspicion, and was summoned to London. His palace was searched and his papers examined in his absence; and the result, though inconclusive, was unsatisfactory. The religious orders again (especially the monks of such houses as had been implicated with the Nun of Kent) were openly recusant. At the convent at Sion, near Richmond, And of the a certain Father Ricot preached as he was commanded, " but he made this addition, that he which commanded him to preach should ducharge his conscience: and as soon," it was said, "as the said Ricot began to declare the king's title," " nine of the brothren departed from the sermon, contrary to the rule of their religion, to the great slander of the audience." 1 Indeed it soon became evident that among the regular clergy no compliance whatever was to be looked for; and the agents of the government began to contemplate the possible consequences, with a tenderness not indeed for the prospective sufferers, but for the authorities whom they would so cruelly compel to punish them. "I am right sorry," wrote Cromwell's secretary to him, " to see the foolishness and obstinacy of divers religious men, so addict to the Bishop of Rome and his usurped power, that they contemn counsel as careless men and willing to die. If it were not for the opinion which men had, and some yet have, in their apparent holiness, it made no great matter what became of them, so their souls were saved. And for my part, I would that all such obstinate persons of them as be ready to die for the advancement of the Bishop of Rome's authority were dead indeed by God's hand, that no man should run wrongfully into obloquy for their just punishment." *

An Order for Preaching: printed in Burnet's Collectones, p. 447.

^{*} Ellie, third series, Vol. 11, p. 873.

John ap Rice to Secretary Cromwell with an account of the search of the Bishop of Durham's chamber: Rolls Ucass M.S.

But the open resistance of mistaken honesty was not the danger which the government most feared. Power of Another pend threatened their authority, desail deeper and more alarming by far. The clergy possessed in the confessional a power of secret influence over the masses of the people, by which they were ablant once (if they so pleased) to grant their penitants licences for insincerity, to permit them to perjure ^{*} Bedyll to Cromwell State Papers, Vol. I. p. 423. Bedyll had been directed by Cromwell to observe how the injunctions were obeyed. He said that he was "in much despair of the reformation of the friam by any gentle or involvable means;" and advised, "that fellows who leave sermons should be put in prison, and made a terrible example of."

[&]quot; Mate Papers, Vol. L p. 422, et seq.

themselves under montal reservations, and to encourage

The clergy advice their positents to take the martin with a maraba asser-

them to expiate a venial falsehood by concealed disaffection. The secrets of confession were inviolable. Anothemas the most fearful forbade their disclosure; and, secured behind this impenetrable shield, the church might defy the most stringent provisions, and baffle every arecaution. From the nature of the case but little could transpire of the use or the abuse which was made at such a time of so vast a power; but Cromwell, whose especial gift it was to wind himself into the secrets of the clergy, had his sleuth bounds abroad, whose scent was not easily baffled. The long tyranny of the priesthood produced also its natural retribution in the informations which were too gladly volunteered in the hour of revenge; and more than one singular disclosure remains among the State Papers, of language used in this Every man who doubted mysterious intercourse. whether he might lawfully abjure the pope, consulted his priest. Haughton, the Prior of Charterhouse, in all such cases, declared absolutely that the abjuration might not be made. He himself refused openly; and it is likely that he directed others to be as open as himself. But Haughton's advice was as exceptional as his conduct. Father Forest, of Greenwich, who was brave man, and afterwards met nobly a cruel death, took the oath to the king as he was required; while he told a penitent that he had abjured the pope in the outward, but not in the inward man, that he "owed an obedience to the pope which he could not shake off," and that it was "his use and practice in confession, to induce men to hold and stick to the old fashion of belief." 1

Strype's Mantrials, Vol. I. p. 306.

Here, again, is a conversation which a treacherous penitent revealed to Cromwell; the persons Confendent in the dialogue being the informer, John John John Staunton, and the confessor of Sion Monastery, who had professed the most excessive levalty to the crown.3 The informer, it must be allowed, was a good-fornothing person. He had gone to the confessor, he said, to be shriven, and had commenced his confession. with acknowledging "the seven deadly sins particularly," "and next the misspending of his five wits." As an instance of the latter, he then in detail had confeased to hereav; he could not persuade himself that the priest had power to forgive him. "Sir," he professed to have said to the confessor, "there is one thing in my stomach which grieveth my conscience very sore; and that is by reason of a sermon I heard vesterday of Master Latimer, saying that no men of himself had authority to forgive sine, and that the pope had no more authority than another bishop; and therefore I am in doubt whether I shall have remission of my sins of you or not, and that the pardon is of no effect."

The priest answered, "That Latimer is a false knave;" and seven or eight times he called him false knave, and said he was an eretycke. "Marry, this I heard Latimer say," the confessor continued, "that

¹ Confessions of Father Forest: Rolls House MS. This seems to have been generally known at the time. Latimer altudes to it in one of his

The confessor cas, do no good with them (the monks), and the obstinate persons be not in fear of him; but he in great fear and danger of his life, by reason of their malice, for that he hath consented to the king's title, and hath preached the same." — Bedyll to Gremwell: State Papers, Va. I. p. 494.

if a man come to confession, and be not sorry for his time, the presst bath no power to forgive him. I say the pope's pardon is as good as ever it was; and he is the Head of the Universal Church, and so I will take him. Here in England the king and his parliament bath put him out; but be of good comfort, and steadfast in your faith; this thing will not last long, I warrant you. You shall see the world change shortly."

To this the informer said that he had replied, " You know how that we be sworn unto the King's Grace, and he hath already abjured the pope."

"As for that," said the priest, "an oath loosely made may be loosely broken, and by this feser thinks example be ye in ease. I had an enemy toosely made come unto this church, and one of his friends and mine came unto me and said, 'Sir, I pray you let us go drink with youder man.' And the said friend maketh such importunate suit unto me to drink with my enemy, that I promise him by my faith that I will go and drink with him; and so indeed doth drink with him. But what then," said the priest; "though I go and drink with him upon this promise, trow you that I will forgive him with my heart. Nay, nay, I warrant you. And so in like wise in this cath concerning the abjuration of the pope. I will not abjure him in my heart," said the priest, "for these words were not spoken unto Peter for nought - 1 will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven' --Reported ad and the pope is Peter's successor. matter," said the priest, " I communed once mer to the confiner of with the Bishop of Canterbury, and I told Mien.

¹ Connece: but we will hope the story is coloured. It is characteristic, however, of the mild, tender-hearted man who desired to glide round differential rather than scale and conquer them.

1594.1

the bishop I would pray for the pope as the chief and papal head of Christ's church. And the bishop told me it was the king's pleasure that I should not. I said unto him I would do it; and though I did it not openly, yet would I do it secretly. And he said I might pray for him secretly, but in any wise do it not openly." 1

Trifles of this kind may seem unimportant; but at the time they were of moment, for their weight was cumulative; and we can only now recover but a few out of many. Such as they are, however, they show the spirit in which the injunctions were received by a section at least of the English clergy. Nor was this the worst. We find language reported, which shows that many among the monks were watching for symptoms of the promised imperial invasion, and the progress of the Irish insurgents. A Doctor Maltisad, Maitland, of the order of Black Friers in Frier, by ble London, had been "heard divers times to ediance of physometry, say, he trusted to see every man's head that foreten a was of the new learning, and the maintainers revolution. of them, to stand upon a stake, and Cranmer's to be one of them. The king," he hoped, might suffer " a violent and shameful death; " and " the queen, that mischievous whore, might be brent." "He said further, that he knew by his science, which was nigromancy, that all men of the new learning should be suppressed and suffer death, and the people of the old barning should be set up again by the power of the king's enemies from the parts beyond the sea." 3

In the May weather of 1534, two Middlesex clergy,

¹ A Paposition concerning the popish Conduct of a Priest: Rolls Home Wa.

Information given by John Maydwell, of treseenable Words epokes against Henry VIII. and Anna Belayn: Rolls House MS.

" walking to and fro in the cloyster garden at Sion, were there overheard compassing sedition and rebellion." John Hale, an eager, tumultuous per-Peron and son, was prompting his brother priest, Robert Feron, with matter for a pamphlet, which Feron was to write against the king.1 "Syth the reahn of England was first a realm," said Hale, " was there never in it so great a robber and piller of the commonwealth read of nor heard of as is our king. He is the most cruellest capital heretic, defacer and treader under foot of Christ and of his church, continually applying and minding to extinct the same; whose death, I Feron hopes that Henry's beseech God, may be like to the death of that may be the most wicked John, sometime king of this tilte that of realm, or rather to be called a great tyran the manmelle e than a king; and that his death may be not much unlike to the end of that manqueller Richard. sometime usurper of this imperial realm. And if thou wilt deeply look upon his life, thou shalt find it more foul and more stinking than a sow wallowing and defiling herself in any filthy place."

There words were spoken in English; Feron translated them into Latin, and wrote them down. Hale then continued: "Until the king and the rulers of this realm be plucked by the pates, and brought, as we say, to the pot, shall we never live merrily in England, which, I pray God, may chance, and now shortly the transverse in which will never shrink in their quarrel to the quarrel, which will never shrink in their quarrel to the them. The noble and gentle Ap Ryce," so cruelly

In this instance we need not doubt that the words were truly reported, for the offenders were tried and pleaded guilty.

The complexey of "young Ryce," or Richard ap Griffyth, is one of the most obscure passages in the history of this reign. It was a Welsh plat.

I think not contrary, but they will join and take part with the Irish, and so much our realm. If they do so, doubt ye not but they shall have aid and strength enough in England. For this is truth: three parts of England be against the king, as he shall find Three parts of England be need. For of truth, they go about to the spanse bring this realm into such miserable condition as is France; which the commons see, and perceive well enough a sufficient cause of rebellion and insurrection in this realm. And truly we of the church shall never live merrily until that day come."

These informations may assist us in understanding, if we cannot forgive, the severe enactments The personal law entire law entire law passed in the ensuing parliament.

It is a maxim of sound policy, that actions only are a proper subject of punishment,—that to treat men as offenders for their words, their intentions, or their opinions, is not justice, but tyranny. But there is no rule which is universally applicable. The policy of a state of war is not the policy of a state of peace. And as a soldier in a campaign is not at liberty to criticise openly the cause for which he is figl.ting; as no general, on his army going into action, can permit a sub-conducted at Islington. [Act of Attainder of Richard up Griffyth, 23 Hon. VIII. cap. 24.] The particulars of it I am unable to discover further, than fall it was a desperate undertaking, encouraged by the uncertainty of the escension, and by a faith in prophecies. Confession of Sir William Nevillet Rolls House MS.), to murder the king. Byce was tried in Michaelmas erm, 1631, and executed. His uncle, who passed under the manu of Brancett, was an active revolutionary agent on the Continent in the later years of Henry's reign. — See Secto Papers, Vol. 1V. pp. 647, 651, 653, Vol. VIII. up. 319, 227, &c.

I Trial and Conviction of John Feron, eleck, and John Hale, clorks begands Secretie; Appendix II to the Third Report of the Deputy Kosper of the Public Lectorie.

ordinate to decline from his duty in the moment of danger, on the plea that he is dissatisfied with the. grounds of the quarrel, and that his conscience forbids him to take part in it; so there are times when whole nations are in a position analogous to that of an army to circumstanced; when the safety of the State depends upon unity of purposo, and when private persons must be compelled to reserve their opinions to theirselves; when they must be compelled neither to exsmotores press them in words, nor to act upon them now power. in their capacity of citizens, except at their utmost peril. At such times the salus populi overrides all other considerations; and the maxims and laws of calmer periods for awhile consent to be suspended. The circumstances of the year 1848 will enable us, if we reflect, not upon what those circumstances medaya 🛦 actually were, but on what they easily might have been, to understand the position of Henry VIII.'s government at the moment of the separation from Rome. If the danger in 1848 had ceased to be imaginary, - if Ireland had broken into a real insurrection, - if half the population of England had been Socialist, and had been in secret league with the leaders of the Revolution in Paris for a combined attack upon the State by insurrection and invasion, - the mere passing of a law, making the use of seditious language an act of treason, would not have been edequate to the danger. Influential persons would have been justly submitted to question on their allemance, and insufficient answers would have been interpreted as justifying suspicion. Not the expression only, of opinions subversive of society, but the holding such opinions, however discovered, would have been regarded and treated as a crime, with the ful. consent of what is called the common sense and educated judgment of the nation.¹

If for "opinions subversive of society," we substitute allegiance to the papacy, the parallel is complete between the year 1848, as it would then have been, and the time when the penal laws which are considored the repreach of the Tudor governments were passed against the Roman Catholics. I assume that the Reformation was in itself right; that the claims of the pope to an English supremacy were unjust; and that it was good and wise to resist those claims. If this be allowed, those laws will not be found to deserve the repreach of tyranny. We shall see in them but the natural resource of a vigorous government placed in circumstances of extreme peril. The Romanism of the present day is a harmless opinion, no The Romanmore productive of evil than any other su- same perstition, and without tendency, or shadow the Romanof tendency, to impair the allegiance of those whetherth. who profess it. But we must not confound a phantom with a substance; or gather from modern experience the temper of a time when words implied realities, when Catholics really behaved that they owed no allegiance to an heretical sovereign, and that the first duty of their lives was to a foreign potentate. This perilous doctrine was waning, indeed, but it was not dead. By many it was actively professed; and among

YOL 0 8

History is never weary of repeating its warnings against narrow judgments. A year ago we believed that the age of arbitrary coverity was past. In the interval we have seen the rebellion in India; the forms of law have been executed, and Hindon rajahs have been executed for no greater trime than the possession of letters from the inaurgents. The evidence of a treasonable arbitrat has been sufficient to ansure condemnation; and in the presence of necessity the principles of the sixteen h century have been instantly ravived. — April, 1858.

those by whom it was denied there were few except the Protestants whom it did not in some degree embarrass and perplex.

The government, therefore, in the close of 1534, having clear evidence before them of in tended treason, determined to put it down with a high band; and with this purpose parliament met again on the 3d of November. The first act of the session was to give the sanction of the legislature to the title which had been conceded by convocation, and to declare the king supreme Head of the Church of England. As affirmed by the legislature, this designation meant something more than when it was granted three years previously by the clergy. It then implied that the spiritnal body were no longer to be an imperium in imperio within the realm, but should hold their powers subordinate to the crown. It was now an assertion of independence of foreign jurisdiction; it was the complement of the Act of Appeals, rounding off into completeness the constitution in Church and State of the English nation. The act is short, and being of so great importance, I insert it entire.

"Albeit," it runs, " the King's Majesty justly and rightfully is and ought to be the supreme Head of the Church of England, and so is recognised by the clergy of this realm in their convocation, yet nevertheless, for corroboration and confirmation thereof, and for increase of virtue in Christ's religion within this realm of England, and to represent and extirp all errours, heresies, and other enormities and abuses heretofore used in the same: Be it enacted, by authority of this present parliament, that the King our Sorreign Lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only supreme Head in earth of the Church of England, called Anglicana Ecclesia, and shall have and enjoy, annexed and united to the imperial crown of this realm, as well the title and style thereof as all the honours, dignities, pre-eminences, jurisdictions, authorities, immunities, profits, and commodities, to the said dignity belonging and appertaining; and that our raid Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall have full power and authority to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errours, heresies, abuses, contempts, and enormities, whatsoever they be, which by any manner of spiritual authority or jurisdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed — most to the pleasure of Almighty God, the increase of virtue in Christ's religion, and for the conservation of the peace, unity, and tranquillity of this realm - any usage, custom, foreign lawes, foreign authority, prescription, or any other thing or things to the contrary hereof notwithstanding." 1

Considerable sarcasm has been levelled at the assumption by Henry of this title; and on the accession of El'zabeth, the crown, while reclaiming the authority, thought it prudent to retire from the designation. Yet it answered a purpose in marking the national time of the revolution, and the emphasis of the title. The name carried home the change into the mind of the country. It was the epitome of all the measures which had been passed against the encroachments of the spiritual powers within and without the realm; it was at once the symbol of the independence the page of England, and the declaration that thence the better forth the civil magistrate was supreme within the English dominions over church as well as state.¹

¹ Act of Supremacy 28 Fee. VIII. cap. 1.

1 To grand against misconception, an explanatory document was descriup by the government at the time of the passing of the act, which is highby curious and significant. "The King's Grace," says this paper, " tath no new authority given boreby that he is recognized as supreme filed of the Church of England; for in that recognition is included only that are Largement power as to a king of right apportunish by the law of God's and got that he abouid take any spiritual power flow spiritual specifiers that is given to them by the Gospel. So that these words, that the kind is someone Hand of the Church, serve ruther to declare and make open ir the world, that the large both power to occurrent all such exterted powers as well of the Boss op of House as of any other within this make, whereby my subjects paget he greered; and to oppose and receive all things whereby any onquireless night griss amought the pusple, ruther than to prove that he phonic protent thereby to take any powers from the reconsists of the specthe that was given to them by God. And foremuch as, in the present of this former parliament holden in the twenty-lifth year of this respuwhereby great experience finite to the bing's subjects by a power from Borns was put ower and therespot the premise was made that pothing should by interpreted and expounded upon that eternia, that the King's Grace, his nobles or subjects, intended to decime or very from the congregation of Chrosin church in earthing concerning the articles of the Letherie fach, or mything declared by Foly Scripture and the Word of God necesgave for his Green's naivetion and Ma subjects a it is not, therefore, most lightly to think that the self-arms persons, outdinging the self-more parincrease, would in the next year following make an act whereby the hear. his nobles and subjects, should so vary. And an man may with conscious judge that they did so, on ever they can prove that the words of the statera, whereby the king is recognized to be the supreme Hand of the Church of England, should store approach that they extended to do my as it to appear ent that they do not.

"There is none nothersty of Seripture that will prove that any one of the apost so should be head of the universal Church of Christendon. And If any of the dectors of the church or the clorgy have, by any of their hors or decrees, declared any deriptors to be of that place, longs and propose, taking to them their counsellers, and such of their clergy as they chall think most indifferent, eaght to be judges whether these de laractime and laws he made according to the truth of Scripture or not, because it is east in the Preims, ' It were Rages entallights, aradiscens put put ratio mmm", that is "O kings" understand ye, he ye may at that judge the world." And certain it is that the Scripture is always trees and there is nothing that the dectors and clergy might, through dread and affection (to well) be deceived in, as in things renearing the honour dignity, per exaborty juried this, and riches of the histoge and dergy, and some of them here of Phelibrad been deceived thereis "- Hearly of Arguments moveming the Power of the Pape and the Royal Segremany: Alde Some ME

325

Whether the king was or was not head of the church, became now therefore the rallying point of the struggle; and the demal or acceptance of his title the test of allegiance or disloyalty. To accept it was to go along with the movement heartily and completely; to deny it was to admit the rival sovereignty of the pope, and with his sovereignty the lawfulness of the sentence of excommunication. It was to imply that Henry was not only not head of the church, but that he was no longer lawful King of England, and that the allegiance of the country must be transferred to the Princess Mary when the pope and the emperor should give the word. There might be no intention of treason; the motive of the opposition might be purely religious; but from the nature of the case opposition of any kind would abet the treason of others; and no honesty of meaning could render possible any longer a double loyalty to the crown and to the papacy.

The act conferring the title was in consequence followed by another, declaring the denial of it The new to be treason. It was necessary to stop the Treason ask. tongues of the noisy mutinous monks, to show them once for all that these high matters were no subjects for triffing. The cath to the succession of the Princess Elizabeth partially answered this purpose; and the obligation to take that oath had been extended to all classes of the king's subjects; 1 but to refuse to swear to the succession was misprision of treason only, not high treason; and the ecclesiastics (it had been seen) found no difficulty in swearing oaths which they did not mean to observe. The parhament therefore now attached to the statute of supremary the following imperious corollary : —

1 20 Hen. VIII. cap. 9

"Foresmuch as it is most necessary, both for com-

For the better security of the restority of the restoring that any person whe, by words, we'll ag, or otherwise, depress the ling or queen of shelf just titles other by dispurity of high treeston.

mon policy and duty of subjects, above all things to prohibit, provide, restrain, and extinct all manner of shameful slanders, perils, or imminent danger or dangers, which might grow, happen, or arise to their sovereign lord the king, the queen, or their heirs, which, when they be heard, seen, or understood, cannot be but odible and also abhorred of all those sorts that be true and loving subjects, if in any point they may, do, or shall touch the king, the queen, their heirs or successors, upon which dependent the whole unity and universal weal of this realm; without providing wherefore, too great a scope should be given to all cankered and traitorous hearts, willers and workers of the same; and also the king's loving subjects should not declare unto their sovereign lord now being, which unto them both hath been and is most entirely beloved and estcemed, their undoubted sincerity and truth: Be it therefore enacted, that if any person or persons, after the first day of February next coming, do mal.ciously wish, will, or desire, by words or writing, or by craft imagine, invent, practise, or attempt any bodily harm to be done er committed to the king's most royal person, the queen's, or their heirs apparent, or to deprive them or any of them of the dignity, title, or name of their royal estates, or slanderously and maliciously publish and pronounce by express writing or words that the king our covereign lord should be heretic, schismatic, t grant, infidel, or usurper of the crown, &c., &c., that all such persons, their siders, counsellors, concertors, or abettors, being thereof lawfully convict according to the laws and customs of the realm, shall be adjudged traitors, and that every such offence in any of the premises shall be adjudged high treason." 1

The terrible powers which were thus committed to the government he on the surface of this lan-

pears, it was still further extended by the interior interpretation of the lawyers. In order to a fall under its penalties it was held not to be necessary that positive guilt should be proved in any one of the specified offences; it was enough if a man refused to give satisfactory answers when subjected to official examination.3 At the discretion of the king or his ministers the active consent to the supremacy might be required of any person on whom they pleased to call, under penalty to the recusant of the dreadful death of a traitor. So extreme a measure can only be regarded as a remedy for an evil which was also extreme; and as on the return of quiet times the parliament made haste to repeal a law which was no longer required, so in the enactment of that law we are bound to believe that they were not betraying English liberties in a spirit of careless complacency; but that they believed truly that the security of the state required unusual precautions. The nation was standing with its sword half drawn in the face of an armed Europe, and it was no time to permit dissensions in the camp. Tolera-

^{1 98} Hen. VIII. cap. 13.

^{*} More warned Finher of this. He "did nead Mr. Fisher word by a letter that Mr. Solicitor had showed him, that it was all one not to answer, end to say against the statute what a man would, as all the learned men in England would justify." - State Papers, Vol. I. p. 434.

I The act was repealed in 1547, 1 Edw. VI. cap. 19. The explanation which is there given of the cancer which led to the conciment of it is tempornts and responsible. Subjects, says that statute, should obey rather for leve of their prince than for fear of his inwar " yet such times at some time someth in the commonwealth, that it is necessary and expedient for the re-their opportunity; and although we may reparticular their opportunity; and although we may regret that in this grand struggle for freedom, success could only be won by the aid of measures which bordered upon oppression, yet here also the even hand of justice was but commending the chalice to the lips of the sew had made others drank it to the dregs. They only were likely to fall under the Treason Act who for centuries had fed the rack and the stake with sufferers for "opinion."

Having thus made provision for public safety, the parhament voted a supply of money for the fortifications on the coast and for the expenses of the Irish war; and after transferring to the crown the first-fruits of church benefices, which had been previously paid to the See of Rome, and passing at the same time a large appointment and liberal measure for the appointment of training twenty-six suffragan bishops, they separated, not to meet again for more than a year.

Meanwhile, at Rome a change had taken place which contain for the moment seemed to promise that the former is storm after all might pass away. The conclave had elected as a successor to Clement a man who, pressing of the insolence and unruliness of men, and for the foresteing and providing of remedias against rebellions, insurrections, or such mischiefs as God, sometime with as displeased, doth inflict and lay upon us, or the devil, at God's permanion, to assay the good and God's elect, doth now and set among us, — the which Almighty God and man's policy hath always been content to have stayed — that sharper laws as a harder bridle should be made."

1 26 Henry VIII. cap. 14: "An Act for Nomination and Consecration of Suffragans within the Realm." I have afready stated my impression that the method of nomination to histoprocks by the crown, as fixed by the 20th of the 25th of Henry VIII., was not intended to be perpetual. A further evidence of what I said will be found in the arrangements under the present act for the appointment of suffragans. The king made no attempt to retain the patronage. The husbop of each discrete was to hominate two parameters, and between these the crown was bound to choose.

of all the Italian ecclesiastics, was the most likely to recompose the quarrels in the church; and who, if the genius or the destiny of the papacy had not been too strong for any individual will, would perhaps have succeeded in restoring peace to Christendom. In the debates upon the divorce the Cardinal Farnese had been steadily upon Henry's side. He had maintained from the first the general justice of the king's demands. After the final sentence was passed, he had urged, though vainly, the reconsideration of that fatal step; and though slow and cautious, although he was a person who, as Sir Gregory Cassalis described him, "would accomplish little, but would make few mistakes," 1 he had allowed his opinion upon this, as on other matters connected with the English quarrel, to be generally known. He was elected therefore by French influence as the person most likely Help shows to meet the difficulties of Europe in a catho- longueste, in lie and conciliating spirit. He had announced the hope he will pursue a his intention, immediately on Clement's death, the hope he will pursue a his intention, immediately on Clement's death, the hope he will pursue and his intention, immediately on Clement's death, of calling a general council at the earliest Policy moment, in the event of his being chosen to fill the papal chair: and as he was the friend rather of Francis I. than of the emperor, and as Francis was actively supporting Henry, and was negotiating at the same moment with the Protestant princes in Germany, it seemed as if a council aummoned under such auspices. would endeavour to compose the general discords in a temper of wise liberality, and that some terms of compromise would be discovered where by mutual concestions Catholic and Protestant might meet upon a conmon ground.

Ibid. p. 874.

Parum erraturus sed pauca facturas - State Popers, Vol. VII. p. 541

The moment was propitious for such a hope; for the accession of a moderate pope coincided with the reaction in Germany which followed the scandals at Munster and the excesses of John of Leyden; and Francis pictured to himself a coalition between France, England, and the Lutherans, which, if the papacy was attached to their side, would be strong enough to bear lown opposition, and reconstitute the churches of Europe upon the basis of liberality which he seemed to have secured for the church of France. The flattering vision in the autumn of the following year dazzled the German princes. Perhaps in the novelty of hope it was encouraged even by the pope, before he had felt the strong hand of fate which ruled his will.

To Charles V. the danger of some such termination of the great question at issue appeared most near and real. Charles, whose resentment at the conduct of England united with a desire to assert his authority over his subjects in Germany, beheld with the utmost Analog and alarm a scheme growing to maturity which menaced alike his honour, his desire of revenge, his supremacy in Europe, and perhaps his religions convictions. A liberal coalition would be fatal to order, to policy, to truth; and on the election of Cardinal Farnese, the Count de Nassau was sent on a secret mission to Paris with overtures, the The mission of the Count elaborate condescension of which betrays the Parts with anxiety that must have dictated them. The emperor, in his self-constituted capacity of the Princess Mary's guardian, offered her hand with the English succession to the Duke of Angoulesme. From the torms on which he was thought to stand with Anne Boleyn, it was thought possible that Henry might consent; I be might not dare, as d'Inteville before auggested, to oppose the united demands of France and the Empire. To Margaret de Valois the Count was to propose the spiendid temptation of a marriage with Philip. If Francis would surrender the English alliance, the emparor would make over to have the passionately coveted Duchy of Milan, to be annexed to France on the death of the reigning Duke. In the mountime

I Wate qu'il no men pas paraventure di firit stalayre à gaugner en rep. — Mate en the margin of the Counte de Namen's Instructions.

Charles V. to Ma Antisanador at Paris.

" Neversbur, 1881.

"... In addition, the Count de Kassan and yourself may go further in granding the King about the Count's proposal — I mean for the marriage of our consist the Proposal of England with the India d'Angesdama. The Grand Master, I understand, when the Count spoke of it, assered to enter into the engineeron, and manuscand the displacement which the King of England had more available against Auna Boloya. I am therefore successly dissistant that the proposal should be well consistent, and you will bring it toward in vershall one opportunity. You will make the King and the Grand Master for the importance of the conservant the greatment which it would confer on the Duke d'Angeologies, the release of the Englash debt, which can be easily granged, and the assurance of the reals of France.

"Such a marriage will be, beyond comparison, more advantageous to the King his realist, and his children, than any benefit for which he could hope from Milan; while it can be brought about with no counderable difficulty. But he careful what you say, and how you say it. Speak nime to the King and alone to the Grand Master, letting suither of them know that you have spokes to the other. Observe carefully how the King is inclined, and, at all events, he secret; so that if he does not like the thing, the world need not know that it has been thought of.

"Monthly the suggested to you — as it may be — that Arms Indept may be driven desperate, and may contrive consthing against the Practice May we assess that we can hardly believe her we stronly abandoned by contribute or, again, the Oaks of Anjou may possibly object to the exaltation of his brother; in which case we shall content willingly to have our course marry the Irake of Anjou; and, in that case, beyond the right which apportains to the I take and Princess from their fathers and mothers, they and sixtured them shall have the hingdom? Demonsh, and we will enset to appropriate any difficulties with our fiely Pather the Papa." — M.S. Arabicas at Branch.

Affelic Papara, Vol. VII. pp. 164, 548.

he would pay to the French king, as " tribute for Milan," a hundred thousand crowns a year, as an acknowledgment of the right of the house of Valous Offers such as these might well have tempted the light ambition of Francis. If sincere, they were equivalent to a surrender of the prize for which the emperor's life had been spent in contending, and perilous indeed it would have been for England if this intrigue had been permitted to succeed. But whether it was that Francus too deeply distrusted Charles, that he preferred the more hazardous scheme of the German alliance, or that he supposed he could gain his object more surely with the help of England, the Count de Nassau the help of England, the Count de Nassau | Performance | left Paris with a decisive rejection of the em| Performance | perfor peror's advances; and in the beginning of January, De Bryon, the High Admiral of France, was sent to England, to inform Henry of what had passed, and to propose for Enzabeth the marriage which Charles had desired for the Princess Mary.

De Bryon's instructions were remarkable. To conberger solidate the alliance of the two nations, he was believed to entreat Henry at length to surrender the claim to the crown of France, which had been the cause of so many centuries of war. In return for this concession, Francis would make over to England, Gravelines, Newport, Dunkirk, a province of Flanders, and "the title of the Duke of Lorrayne to the town of Antwerp, with sufficient assistance for the recovery of the same." Henry was not to press Francis to part from the papacy; and De Bryon seems to have indicated a hope that the English king might retrace his own steps. The weight of French influence, meanwhile, was to be pressed, to induce the pope to revoke and denounce, voyd and frustrate the unjust and slanderous sentence¹ given by his predecessor; and the terms of this new league were to be completed by the betrothal of the Princess Elizabeth to the Duke of Angoulesme.²

There had been a time when these proposals would have answered all which Henry desired. In the early days of his reign he had indulged himself in visions of empire, and of repeating the old glories of the Plantagenet kings. But in the peace which was concluded after the defeat of Pavis, he showed that he had resigned himself to a wiser policy,* and the surrender of a barren designation would cost him little. quarrel with the pope, also, be had professed an extreme reluctance to impair the unity of the church; and the sacrifices which he had made, and the years of persevering struggle which be had endured, had proved that in those professions he had not been insincere. But Henry's character was not what it had been when Charge in he won his title of Defender of the Faith. In Sharacter. the experience of the last few years he had learnt to conceive some broader sense of the meaning of the Reformation; and he had gathered from Cromwell and Latimer a more noble conception of the Protestant doctrines. He had entered upon an active course of legislation for the putting away the injustices, the falsehoods, the oppressions of a degenerate establishment; and in the strong sense that he had done right, and nothing else but right, in these measures, he was not now disposed to submit to a compromise, or to consent to undo anything which he was satisfied had been justly done, in consideration of any supposed benefit which he could receive from the pope. He was anxious to remain in communion with the see of Rome. He was willing to acknowledge in some innocuous form the Roman supremacy. But it could be only on his own terms. The pope must come to him; he could not go to the pope. And the papal precedency should only again be admitted in England on conditions which should leave untouched the Act of Appeals, and should preserve the sovereignty of the crown unimpaired.

3 State Papers, Vol. VII pp. 584-590.

¹ This is Crozawell's paraphrase. Francis is not respensible for the language.

See the long and curious corresponds too between the English and Spanish courts in the State Papers, Vol. VI.

He replied, therefore, to the overtures of Francis,

Benzy's that he was ready to enter into negotiations for the resignation of his title to the crown of the France, and for the proposed marriage. Be fore any other step was taken, however, he des'red his good brother to insist that "the Bishop of Rome"

should revoke the sentence, and "declare his The pope must nieke pretended marriage with the Lady Catherine the frat prove tonaught;" "which to do," Henry wrote (and wards a rec this portion of his reply is written by his own encillation. hand), " we think it very facile for our good brother; since we do perceive by letters [from Rome] both the opinions of the learned men there to be of that opinion that we be of: and also a somewhat disposition to that purpose in the Bishop of Rome's self, according to equity, reason, and the laws both positive and divine." If there was to be a reconciliation with the Holy See, the first advance must be made on the Bishop of Rome's side; and Cromwell, in a simultaneous despatch, warned Francis not "to move or desire his Grace to the violation of any laws recently passed, as a thing whereanto he would in no wise condescend OF SETOC. 11 3

I State Papers, Vol. VII. pp. 587, 580.

⁴ Tald. p. 887

Henry, however, felt no confidence either in the sin cerity of the pope, or in the sincerity of the Heavy de-French king, as he haughtily showed. He trust from did not even trust De Bryon's account of the rejection of the overtures of the emperor. "If it happeneth," he wrote, "that the said Bishop will obstinately follow the steps of his predecessor, and he more inclined to the maintenance of the actions and sentences of his see than to equity and justice, then we trust that our good brother - perceiving the right to stand on our side, and that not only the universities of his whole realm and dominions bath so defined, but also the most part of the rest of Christendom, and also the best learned men of the Bishop of Rome's own council. now being called for that purpose -- will fully and wholly, both he and his whole realm, adhere and cleave to us and our doings in this behalf; and we herein desire shortly to have answer, which we would be right loth should be such as whereupon we might take any occasion of suspicion; trusting, further, that our said good brother will both promise unto us upon his word, and indeed perform, that in the meantime, before the meeting of our deputies,1 he nor directly nor indirectly shall practise or set forth any mean or intelligence of marriage, or of other practices with the emperour." ?

So cold an answer could have arisen only from deep distrust; it is difficult to say whether the The pope makes led! rect advances made indirectly from the pope were are received attacked. Analogous advances made indirectly from the pope were are received attacked. The pope were attacked attacked. The pope were attacked attacked.

¹ Who were to arrange the betrothal (f Elizabeth to the Duke of Anguelouse).

^{*} Henry VIII. to De Bryon: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. $89.

he was now called, had expressed the greatest drare to please the king. He had sent for lawyers out of Tuscany, on whose judgment he had great reliance, and these lawyers had given an opinion that the pope might ex officio annul the first marriage as Henry desired, and prenounce the second valid.1 This was well, but it did not go beyond words; and of these there had been too many. The English government had fed upon "the cameleon's dish," "eating the air prom-Jan mary. ise crammed," till they were weary of so weak a diet, and they desired something more substantial. If the pope, replied Cromwell, be really well disposed, let him show his disposition in some public manner, "of his own accord, with a desire only for the truth, and without waiting till the King's Majesty entreat him." B It would have been more courteous, and perhaps it would have been more just, if the French overtures had been met in a warmer spirit; for the policy of Francis required for the time a cordial understanding with England; and his conduct seems to prove that he was sincerely anxious to win the pope to completency.8 But Henry's experience guided him wisely with the Roman Bishop; and if he had been entangled into confidence in Farnese, he would have been entangled to his ruin.

The spring of 1585 was consumed in promises, neThe language of the gotiations, and a repetition of the profitless papers had been incoastory of the preceding years. Suddenly, in the midst of the unreality, it became clear had been that one man at least was serious. Henry,

¹ State Papers, Vol. VIL p. 581.

Sui spente solius ventatis propaganda atudio; millà regia Majostata.
Intercessione expectati.
— Cremwell to Cassalia : Ibid. p. 592.

^{*} Language can coarcely be stronger than that which he directed his ambusuador at Rome to use - thort, at least, of absolute menace. — Ihid. pp. 193, 194.

with an insurgent Ireland and a mutinous England upon his hands, had no leisure for diplomatic finesse; he had learnt his lesson with Clement, and was not to be again deceived. The language of the Roman see had been inconsistent, but the actions of it had been always uniform. From the first beginning of the dispute to the final break and excommunication, in the teeth of his promises, his flatteries, his acknowledgments, Clement had been the partisan of Cathorine. When the English agents were collecting the opinions of the Italian universities, they were thwarted by his emissaries. He had intrigued against Henry in Scotland: he had tampered with Henry's English and Irish subjects; he had maintained a secret correspondence with Cathorine herself. And so well had his true feelings and the true position of the question been understood by the papal party in England, that at the very time when at Marseilles and elsowhere the pope himself was admitting the justice of the king's demand, the religious orders who were most unwavering in their allegiance to the papacy, were pressing their opposition to the divorce into rebellion.

When, therefore, the chair of St. Peter was filled by a new occupant, and language of the matter same smooth kind began again to issue from pope, therefore, the English government could not for so in action, the light a cause consent to arrest their measures, may not be or suspend the action of laws which had been passed from a conviction of their necessity. Whatever might become of French marriages, or of the cession of a corner of the Netherlands and a few towns upon the cuart in exchange for a gaudy title, the English Reformation must continue its way; the nation must be steered clear among the reefs and shoals of treason your.

The late statutes had not been passed without a cause; and when occasion came to enforce them, were not to pass off, like the thunders of the Vatican, in impotent poise.

Here, therefore, we are to enter upon one of the The marker grand scenes of history; a solemn battle derne of Catholica fought out to the death, yet fought without and Protes ferocity, by the champions of rival principles. tente anuto-gens to destru in Heroic men had fallen, and were still fast hattin. falling, for what was called heresy; and now those who had inflicted death on others were called upon to bear the same witness to their own sincerity. England became the theatre of a war between two armies of martyrs, to be waged, not upon the open field, in open action, but on the stake and on the scaffold, with the nobler weapons of passive endurance. Each party were ready to give their blood; each party were ready to shed the blood of their antagonists; and the sword was to single out its victims in the rival ranks, not as in peace among those whose crimes made them dangerous to society, but, as on the field of battle, where the most conspicuous courage most challenges the aim of the enemy. It was war, though under the form of peace; and if we would understand the true spirit of the time, we must regard Catholics and Protestants as gallant soldiers, whose deaths, when they fall, are not painful, but glorious; and whose devotion we are equally able to admire, even where we cannot equally approve their cause. Courage and self-sacrifice are beautiful alike in an enemy and in a friend. And while we exult in that chivalry with which the Smithfield martyrs bought England's freedom with their blood, so we will not refuse our admiration to those other gallant wen whose high forms, in the sunset of the old fuith, stand transfigured on the horizon, tinged with the light of its dying glory.

Secretary Bedyll, as we saw above, complained to Cromwell of the obstinacy of certain friars and monks who, he thought, would confer a service on the country by dying quietly, lest honest men should incur un merited obloquy in putting them to death. Among these, the brethren of the London Charter- The months house were especially mentioned as recalci- of the London Charter trant, and they were said at the same time house. to bear a high reputation for holiness. In a narrative written by a member of this body, we are brought face to face, at their time of trial, with one of the few religious establishments in England which continued to deserve the name; and we may see, in the scenes which are there described, the highest representation of struggles which graduated variously according to character and temper, and, without the tragical result, may have been witnessed in very many of the monastic houses. The writer was a certain Maurice Channey, probably an Irishman. He went through the some sufferings with the rest of the brethren, and was one of the small fraction who finally gave way under the trial. He was set at liberty, and escaped abroad: and in penance for his weakness, he left on record the touching story of his fall, and of the triumph of his bolder companions.

He commences with his own confession. He had fallen when others stood. He was, as he story of mays, an unworthy brother, a Saul among consequence the prophets, a Judas among the spostles, a child of Ephrasm turning himself back in the day of battle—for which his cowardice, while his brother monks were saints in heaven, he was loing penance in sorrow, toosing on the waves of the wide world. The early chapters contain a loving lingering picture of his clois ter life — to him the perfection of earthly happiness. It is placed before us, in all its superstition, its devotion, and its simplicity, the counterpart, even in minute details, of the stories of the Saxon recluses when morasticism was in the young vigour of its life. Bede or St. Cuthbert might have found himself in the house of the London Carthusians, and he would have had few questions to ask, and no duties to learn or to The form of the buildings would have seemed more elaborate; the notes of the organ would have added richer solemnity to the services; but the salient features of the scene would have been all famil-Tulty of the iar. He would have lived in a cell of the same shape, he would have thought the same thoughts, spoken the same words in the same language. The prayers, the daily life, almost the very faces with which he was surrounded, would have seemed all unaltered. A thousand years of the world's history had rolled by, and these lonely islands of prayer had remained still anchored in the stream; the strands of the ropes which held them, wearing now to a thread, and very near their last parting, but still unbroken. What they had been they were; and, if Maurice Channey's description had come down to us as the account of the monastery in which Offa of Mercia did penance for his crimes, we could have detected no internal symptoms of a later age.

His pages are filled with the old familiar stories of manages visions and miracles; of strange adventures befailing the chalices and holy wafers; of angels with wax candles; innocent phantoms which

l Historia Martyrum Anglarum, cap. 2.

flitted round brains and minds fevered by asceticism. There are accounts of certain fratres reprobi et corum terribilis puntio - frail brethren and the frightful catastrophes which ensued to them.1 Brother Thomas. who told stories out of doors, apud saculares, was attacked one night by the devil; and the fiend would have strangled him but for the prayers of a companion. Brother George, who craved after the fleshpots of Egypt, was walking one day about the cloister when he ought to have been at chapel, and the great figure upon the cross at the end of the gallery turned its back upon him as it hung, and drove him all but mad-Brother John Daly found fault with his dinner, and said that he would as soon cat toads Justus Deus non fraudavit eum desiderio suo — his cell was for three months filled with toads. If he threw them into the fire, they hopped back to him unscorelied; if he killed them, others came to take their piace.

But these bad brothers were rare exceptions. In general the house was perhaps the best ordered in England. The hospitality was well esustained, the charities were profuse, and whatever we may think of the intellect which could busy itself with fancies seemingly so childish, the monks were true to their vows, and true to their duty as far as they comprehended what duty meant. Among many good, the Character of Haughton, prior John Haughton was the best. He was the prior, of an old English family, and had been educated at Camoridge, where he must have been the contemporary of Latiener. At the age of twenty-eight he took the vows as a monk, and had been twenty years a Carthunian at the opening of the troubles of the Reformation

1 Historia Martyrum Anglerum, cap. 8.

842

He is described as "small in stature, in figure graceful, in countenance dignified," "In manner he was most modest; in eloquence most sweet; in chastity without stain " We may readily imagine his appearance; with that feminine austerity of expression which, as has been well said, belongs so peculiarly to the features of the medissval ecclesiastics.

Such was the society of the monks of the Charterhouse, who, in an era too late for their continuance, and guilty of being unable to read the signs of the times, were summoned to wage unequal battle with the world. From the commencement of the divorce cause they had espoused instinctively the queen's supone the side; they had probably, in common with their affiliated house at Sion, believed unwisely in the Nun of Kent; and, as pious Catholics, they regarded the reforming measures of the parliament with dismay and consternation. The year 1538, says Maurice, was ushered in with signs in heaven and prodigies upon earth, as if the end of the world was at hand; as indeed of the monks and the monks' world the end was truly at hand. And then came the spring of 1534, when the act was passed cutting off the Princess Mary from the succession, and requiring of all subjects of the realm an cath of allegiance to Elizabeth, and a recognition of the king's marriage with Queen Anne. Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher went to the Tower, as we saw, rather than swear; and about the same time the royal commissioners appeared at the Charterhouse to require the submission of the brethren. The regular clergy through the kingdom had bent to the storm. The conscience of the London Carthusians was less elastic; they were the first and, with the exception of More and Fisher, the only recusants. " The prior did answer The prior to the commissioners," Maurice tells us, the threat " that he knew nothing of such matters, and and whom." could not meddle with them; and they continuing to insist, and the prior being still unable to give other answer, he was sent with Father Humphrey, our proctor, to the Tower." There he remained for a month; and at the end of it he was persuaded by The prior is a certain good and learned men" I that the sobuit, sat cause was not one for which it was lawful to conditions. suffer. He undertook to comply, sub conditions, with some necessary reservations, and was sent home to the cloister. As soon as he returned, the brethren assembled in their chapter-house " in confusion and great perplexity," and Haughton told them what he had promised. He would submit, he said, and yet his misgivings foretold to him that a submission so made could not long avail. "Our hour, dear brethren," he continued, " is not yet come. In the same night in which we were set free I had a dream that I should The priorie not escape thus. Within a year I shall be drain. brought again to that place, and then I shall finish my course." If martyrdom was so near and The wools so inevitable, the remainder of the monks bearing, were at first reluctant to purchase a useless delay at the price of their convictions. The commissioners came with the lord mayor for the oath, and matathes it was refused. They came again, with the state threat of instant imprisonment for the whole fraternity; "and then," says Maurice, "they prevailed with as. We all swore as we were required, making one condition, that we submitted only so far as it was lawful for us so to do. Thus, like Jonah, we were delivered from the belly of this monster, this immanisceta, and began again to rejoice like him, under the shadow of the gourd of our home. But it is better to trust in the Lord than in princes, in whom is no salvation; God had prepared a worm that smote our gourd and made it to perish."

1 Historia Martyrum, cap. 9.

I Stokenby, Bishop of London, acrong others: State Papers, Vol. I. pp. 433, 494.

This worm, as may be supposed, was the act of supremacy, with the statute of treasons which was attached to it. It was ruled, as I have said, that madequate answers to official inquiry formed sufficient ground for prosecution under these acts. But this interpretation was not generally known; nor among those who knew it was it certain whether the crown would avail itself of the powers which it thus possessed. or whether it would proceed only against such offenders as had voluntarily committed themselves to mosesses opposition. In the opening of the following hears of the year [1585] the first uncertainty was at an end; it was publicly understood that persons who had previously given cause for suspicion might be submitted to question. When this bitter news was no longer doubtful, the prior called the convent together, and gave them notice to prepare for what was coming. They lay already under the shadow of treason; and he anticipated, among other evil consequences of disobedience, the immediate dissolution of the house. Even he, with all his forebodings, was unprepared for the course which would really be taken with them. "When we were all in great consternation," writes our author, " he said to us: --

Wery sorry am I, and my heart is heavy, espe cially for you, my younger friends, of whom I see so many round me. Here you are living in your the prior innocence. The yoke will not be laid on your necks, nor the rod of persecution. But if you are taken hence, and imagle among the Genti es, you may learn the works of them, and having begun in the spirit you may be consumed in the flesh. And there may be others among us whose hearts are still infirm. If these mix again with the world, I fear how it may be with them; and what shall I say, and what shall I do, if I cannot save those whom God has trusted to my charge?'

"Then all who were present," says Channey, "burst into tears, and cried with one voice, 'Let us die together in our integrity, and heaven and earth shall witness for us how unjustly we are cut off."

"The prior answered, sadly, - Would, indeed, that it might be so; that so dving we might live, as living we die — but they will not do to us so great a kindness, nor to themselves so great an injury. of you are of noble blood; and what I think they will do is this: Me and the elder brethren they will kill; and they will dismiss you that are young into a world which is not for you. If, therefore, it depend Hittmay be on me alone — if my oath will suffice for the will make house - I will throw myself for your sakes on himself the mercy of God. I will make myself anath- his brothers. ema; and to preserve you from these dangers, I will consent to the king's will. If, however, they have determined otherwise — if they choose to have the conwent of us all — the will of God be done. If one death will not avail, we will die alt.'

"So then, bidding us prepare for the worst, that the Lord when he knocked might find us ready, he desired us to choose each our confessor, and to confess our sine one to another, giving us power to grant each other absolution.

on the 59th Psalm, — 'O God, Thou hast cast us off, Thou hast destroyed us;' concluding with the words, 'It is better that we should suffer here a short me today penance for our faults, than be reserved for mate their thei

Thus, with unobtrusive nobleness, did these poor men prepare themselves for their end; not less beautiful in their resolution, not less deserving the everlasting remembrance of mankind, than those three hundred who in the summer morning sate combing their golden hair in the passes of Thermopyles. We will not regret their cause; there is no cause for which any man can more nobly suffer than to witness that it is better for him to die than to speak words which he does not mean. Nor, in this their hour of trial, were they left without higher comfort.

"The third day after," the story goes on, " was the mass of the Holy Ghost, and God made known his presence among us. For when the host was lifted up, there came as it were a whisper of air, which breathed upon our faces as we knelt. Some perceived it with the boddy senses; all felt it as it thrilled into their bearts. And then followed a sweet, soft sound of music, at which our venerable father was so moved, God being thus abundantly manifest among us, that he sank down in tears, and for a long time contained the service — we all remaining stupified, hearing the inclody, and feeling the marvellous effects of it upon our spirits, but knowing neither whonce it came nor whither it went. Only our hearts rejoiced as we perceived that God was with us indeed."

The 60th in the English variou.

Comforted and resolute, the brotherhood awaited patiently the approach of the commissioners; The governand they waited long, for the crown was in no base to no haste to be severe. The statutes had statutes been passed in no spirit of cruelty; they were weapons to be used in case of extremity; and there was no attempt to enforce them until forbearance was misconstrued into fear. Sir Thomas More and the Bishop of Rochester remained unquestioned in the Tower, and were allowed free intercourse with their friends. The Carthusian monks were left undisturbed, although the attitude which they had assumed was notorious, and although the prior was known to forbid his penitents in confession to acknowledge the king's suprem-If the government was at length driven to severity, it was because the clergy forced them to it in spite of themselves.

The clergy had taken the oath, but they held themselves under no obligation to observe it; or if conduct of they observed the orders of the crown in the letter, they thwarted those orders in the spirit. The Treason Act had for awhile overawed them; but finding that its threats were confined to language, that months passed away, and that no person had as yet been procecuted, they fell back into open opposition, either careless of the consequences, or believing that the government did not dare to exert its powers. The details of their conduct during the spring months of this year I am unable to discover; but it was such as at length, on the 17th of April, provoked the following circular to the lords-lieutenant of the various counties: 1—

" Right trusty and well-beloved coasin, we greet you Circular of the 17th of April. well; and whereas it has come to our knowledge that sundry persons, as well religious as secular priests and curates in their parishes and in divers places within this our realm, do daity, as much as in them is, set forth and extel the by the pope jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome, otherwise called the Pope; sowing their seditions, pesti ent, and false doctrines; praying for him in the pulpit and making him a god; to the great deceit of our subjects. bringing them into errours and evil opinions; more preferring the power, laws, and purisdiction of the said Bishop of Rome than the most holy laws and precepts of Almighty God: We therefore, minding not only to proceed for an unity and quietness among our said subjects, but also greatly coveting and desiring them to be brought to a knowledge of the mere verity and truth, and no longer to be seduced with any such superstitious and false doctrines of any earthly usurper of God's laws - will, therefore, and command you, that whensoever ye shall hear of any such seditions The ting poston add persons, ye indelayedly do take and apprehend that the perthem, or cause them to be apprehended and shall be artaken, and so committed to ward, there to remain without bail or mainprize, until, upon your le Printed in Strype's Memorials, Vol. L. Appendix, p. 208.

advertisement thereof to us and to our council, ye shall know our further pleasure.

HENRY R."

In obvious connexion with the issue of this publication, the monks of the Charterhouse were at The Carter length informed that they would be questioned will upor to seknow! on the supremacy. The great body of the edge the religious houses had volunteered an outward premary The London Carthusians, with other affiliated establishments, had remained passive, and had thus furnished an open encouragement to disobedience. We are instinctively inclined to censure an interference with persons who at worst were but dreamers of the cloister; and whose innocence of outward offences we imagine might have served them for a shield. pily, behind the screenwork of these poor saints a whole Irish insurrection was blazing in madness and fury; and in the northern English counties were some sixty thousand persons ready to rise in arms. In these great struggles mon are formidable in proportion to The reason. their virtues. The noblest Protestants were during the chosen by the Catholics for the stake. The government. fagots were already growing which were to burn Tyndal, the translator of the Bible. It was the habit of the time, as it is the habit of all times of real danger, to spare the multitude but to strike the leaders, to make responsibility the shadow of power, to choose for punshment the most efficacious representatives of the spirit which it was necessary to subdue.

The influence of the Carthusians, with that of the two great men who were following the same road to the same goal, determined multitudes in the attitude which they would assume, and in the duty which they would choose. The Carthusians, therefore, were to be made to bend; or if they could not be bent, to be made examples in their punishment, as they had made themselves examples in their resistance. They were noble and good; but there were others in England good and nable as they, who were not of their fold; and whose virtues, thenceforward more required by England than cloistered asceticisms, had been blighted under the shadow of the papacy. 'The Catholics had chosen the alternative, either to crush the free thought which was bursting from the soil, or else to be crushed by it; and the future of the world could not be sacrifixed to preserve the exotic graces of mediaval sainta. They fell, gloriously and not unprofitably. They were not allowed to stay the course of the Reformation; but their sufferings, nobly borns, sufficed to recover the sympathy of after-ages for the faith which they pro-Ten righteous men were found in the midst of the corruption to purchase for Romanism a few more centuries of tolerated endurance.

To return to the narrative of Maurice Channey. Notice of the intention of the government having been signified to the order. Father Webster and Father Lawrence, the priors of the two daughter houses of Axholm and Belvi le, came up to London three weeks after Easter, and, with Haughton, presented themselves before Cromwell with an entreaty to be excused the For answer to their petition they were submasion. sent to the Tower, where they were soon after joined by Father Reynolds, one of the recalcitrant monks of Sion. These four were brought on the 26th of April before a committee of the privy council, of which Cromwell was one. The act of supremacy was laid before them, and they were required to signify their acceptance of it. They refused, and two days after they were brought to trial before a special commission. They pleaded all "not and brought guilty." They had of course broken the act; April 28. but they would not acknowledge that guilt could be involved in disobedience to a law which was itself unlawful. Their words in the Tower to the privy council formed the matter of the charge against them. It appears from the record that on their examination, "they, treacherously machinating and desiring to deprive the king our sovereign lord of his title of supreme Head of the Church of England, did openly declare and say, the king our sovereign lord is not supreme Head on earth of the Church of England." 1

But their conduct on the trial, or at least the conduct of Haughton, spared all difficulty in securing a conviction. The judges pressed the prior "not to shew so little wisdom as to maintain his own opinion against the consent of the realm." He Laurance replied, that he had resolved originally to the bar imitate the example of his Master before Herod, and say nothing. "But since you urge me," he continued, " that I may satisfy my own conscience and the consciences of these who are present, I will say that our opinion, if it might go by the suffrages of men, would have more witnesses than yours. You can produce on your side but the parliament of a angle kingdom; I, on mine, have the whole Christian world except that kingdom. Nor have you all even of your own recplo. The lesser part is with you. The majority, who seem to be with you, do but dissemble, to gain favone with the king, or for fear they should lose their honours and their dignities."

I fings de Secretar; Appendix II to the Third Report of the Deputy.
Emper of the Public Records.

Cromwell asked him of whom he was speaking. Of all the good men in the realm," he replied; "and when his Majesty knows the truth, I know well he will be beyond measure offended with those of his behops who have given him the counsel which he now follows."

"Why," said another of the judges, "have you, contrary to the king's authority within the realm, persuaded so nany persons as you have done to disobey the king and parliament?"

" I have declared my opinion," he answered, " to no man living but to those who came to me in confession, which in discharge of my conscience I could not refuse. But if I did not declare it then, I will declare it now, because I am thereto obliged to God." 1 He neither looked for mercy nor desired it. A writ was issued for the return of a petty jury the follow-Thursday, ing day. The prisoners were taken back to the Tower, and the next morning were brought again to the bar. Feron and Hale, the two priests whose conversation had been overheard at Sion, were placed on their trial at the same time. The two latter threw themselves on the mercy of the court. A The prices. verdict of guilty was returned against the danunec]. other four. The sentence was for the usual punishment of high treason. Feron was pardoned; I do not find on what account. Hale and the Carthusians were to suffer together. When Haughton heard the sentence, he morely said, "This is the judgment of the world." 2

¹ Strypt's Menorials, Vol. I. p. 305; Historia Martyrum Anglerum.

Father Maurice says that the jury desired to acquire and after debating for a night, were preparing a verdict of Not Guilty; when Cromwell, hearing of their intention, went in person to the room where they were assembled, and threatened them with neath unless they did what he called their

An interval of five days was allowed after the trial. On the 4th of May, the execution took place was a at Tyburn, under circumstances which marked the occasion with peculiar meaning. The punishment in cases of high treason was very terrible. I need not dwell upon the form of it. The English were a hard, fierce people; and with these poor sufferers the law of the land took its course without alleviation or interfer ence. But another feature distinguished the present execution. For the first time in English history, They are ecclesiastics were brought out to suffer in their the states habits, without undergoing the previous care- batter mony of degradation. Thenceforward the world were to know, that as no sanctuary any more should protect traitors, so the sacred office should avail as little; and the hardest blow which it had yet received was thus dealt to superstition, shaking from its place in the minds of all men the key-stone of the whole system.

To the last moment escape was left open, if the Several members of the prisoners would submit. council attended them to the closing scene, for a last effort of kindness; but they had chosen their course, and were not to be moved from it. Haugh- Haughton ton, as first in rank, had the privilege of first distinct. dving. When on the scaffold, in compliance with the usual custom, he spoke a few touching and simple words to the people. "I call to witness Alm ghty God," he said, "and all good people, and I beseech duty. The story is internally improbable. The conditions of the case did not admit of an acquit al; and the conduct attributed to Cromwell is inconsistent with his character. Any doubt which might comain, in the absence of opposing testimony, is removed by the record of the trial, from which it appears clearly that the jury were not returned until the 20th of April, and that the perdict was given in on the same day. - Bage de Seesa-'to: Appendix to the Third Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Public Receives.

VOL. 11.

you all here present to bear witness for me in the day of judgment, that being here to die, I declare that it is from no obstinate rebellious spirit that I do not obey the king, but because I fear to offend the Majesty of God. Our holy mother the church has decreed otherwise than the king and the parliament have decreed, and therefore, rather than disobey the church, I am ready to suffer. Pray for me, and have mercy on my brethren, of whom I have been the unworthy prior." He then knelt down, repeating the first few verses of the 31st Psalm, and after a few moments delivered himself to the executioner. The others folthe second lowed, undaunted. As one by one they trees the went to their death, the council, at each zeat to submit, but la fresh horrible spectacle, arged the survivors to have pity on themselves; but they urged them in The faces of these men did not grow pale; their voices did not shake; they declared themselves liege subjects of the king, and obedient children of holy church; "giving God thanks that they were held worthy to suffer for the truth." All died without a murnur. The stern work was ended with quartering the bodies; and the arm of Haughton was hung up as a bloody sign over the archway of the Charterhouse, to awe the remaining brothers into submission.

But the spirit of the old martyrs was in these friars. One of them, like the Theban sister, bore away the ¹ H In thee, O Lord, have I put my trust: let me never be put to confusion: deliver me in thy righteenmess. Bow down thine ear to me; make haste to deliver me. And be then my strong rock, and house of defence, that then mayest save me. For thou art my strong rock, and my castle, be thou also my guide, and lead me for thy name's sake. Draw me out of the nest that they have laid privily for me: for thou art my strongth. Into thy hard I coremend my spirit, for their hast redeemed me, O Lord, thru Graf truth!

⁹ Mederia Martyrum Angirrum.

honoured relic and buried it; and all resolved to persist in their resigned opposition. Six weeks June 10. Three more were allowed them to consider. At the end Continuous of that time three more were taken, tried, and and and hanged; 1 and this still proving ineffectual, Cromwell hesitated to proceed.

The end of the story is very touching and may be told briefly, that I may not have occasion to occasion geturn to it. Maurice's account is probably hadate. exaggerated, and is written in a tone of strong emotion; but it has all the substantial features Choo of the of truth. The remaining monks were left carthulant in the house; and two secular priests were sent to take charge of the establishment, who starved and illused them; and were themselves, according to Maurica, sensual and profligate. From time to time they were called before the privy council. Their friends and relatives were ordered to work upon them. No effort either of severity or kindness was spared to induce them to submit; as if their attitude, so long as it was maintained, was felt as a reproach by the government, At last, four were carried down to Westminster Abbey, to hear the Bishop of Durham deliver his famous sermon against the pope; and when this rhetorical inanity had also failed, and as they were thought to confirm one another in their obstinacy, they were dispersed among other houses the temper of which could be depended upon. Some were sent to the north; others to Sion, where a new prior had been appointed, of sealous loyalty; others were left at home to be disciplined by the questionable seculars. But nothing answered. Two found their way into active rebellion, and being concerned in the Pilgrimage of Grace, were hung in chains at York. Ten were sent to Newgate, required where nine died miserably of prison fever will and silth; I the tenth survivor was executed. The remainder, of whom Maurice was one, went through a form of submission, with a mental reservation, and escaped abroad.

³ On the 19th of June. Hall mays they were incoinnt to Oromovell on their trial.

So fell the monks of the London Charterhouse, splintered to pieces - for so only could their resistance be overcome - by the iron sceptre and the iron hand which held it. They were, however, alone of their kind. There were many perhaps who wished to resemble them, who would have imitated their example had they dared. But all bent except these. If it had been otherwise, the Reformation would have been impossible, and perhaps it would not have been The necescruel one, needed. Their story claims from us that but the govsympathy which is the due of their exalted der Sergensing mot to be courage. But we cannot blame the governblemed Those who know what the condition of the ment. country really was, must feel their inability to suggest, with any tolerable reasonableness, what else could have been done. They may regret so hard a necessity, but they will regret in silence. The king, too, was not without feeling. It was no matter of indifference to him that he found himself driven to such stern courses. with his subjects; and as the golden splendour of his manhood was thus sullenly clouding, "he commanded all about his court to poll their heads," in The king public token of mourning; "and to give court late them example, he caused his own head to be mourning polled; and from thenceforth his heard to be knotted, and to be no more shaven." I

^{1 &}quot; By the hand of God," according to Mr. Secretary Bedyll. " My very good Lord, after my most hearty commendations, it shall please your lordship to understand that the monks of the Charterbouse here in London work were committed to Nowgate for their traiterous behaviour, long time continued against the King's Grace, be almost dispatched by the hand of field, as may oppear to you by this bill enclosed; whereof, considering their behaviour and the whole matter, I am not corry, but would that all such as love not the King's Highness and his worldly honour were in like test "—Bedyll to Framwell. Suppression of the Monasterna, p. 182.

The friars of Charterhouse suffered for the Catholic faith, as Protestants had suffered, and were May 8. still to suffer, for a faith fairer than theirs. typ who In this same month of May, in the same Catholian year, the English annals contain another entry of no less sad significance. The bishops, as each day they parted further from their old allegiance, and were called in consequence by the hateful name of heretics, were increasingly anxious to prove by evident tokens their zeal for the true faith; and although the late act of heresy had moderated their powers, yet power enough remained to enable them to work their will upon all extreme offenders. Henry, also, it is likely, was not sorry of an opportunity of showing that his justice was even-handed, and that a schism from the papacy was not a lapse into heterodoxy. His mind was moving. Latimer and Shaxton, who three years before had been on trial for their lives, were soon to be upon the bench; and in the late injunctions, the Bible, and not the decrees of the church, had been hold up as the canon of truth. But heresy, though the definition of it was changing, remained a crime; and although the limits of permitted belief were imperceptibly enlarging, to transgress the recognised boundaries was an offence enormous as ever.

If we can conceive the temper with which the

¹ Stow, p. 571. And see the Dir y of Richard Hiller, merchant, of Loutes, MS., Belliot College, Oxford.

reasonable and practical English at present regard the Socialists of the continent, deepened by an intensity of conviction of which these later ages have had but little experience, we can then imagine the light in repulse and which the Anabaptists of the Netherlands and of the Anabaptists of the Netherlands and of the appeared in the eyes of orthodox Europe. If some opinions, once thought heretical, were regarded with less agitated repugnance, the heresy of these enemies of mankind was patent to the world. On them the laws of the country might take their natural course, and no voice was raised to speak for them.

We find, therefore, in Stow's Chronicle, the following brief entry: " The five and twentieth May 25. day of May were, in St. Paul's church, London, examined nipeteen men and six women, born in Holland, whose opinions were - first, that in Christ is not two natures, God and man; secondly, that Christ took neither flesh nor blood of the Virgin Mary; thirdly, that children born of infidels may be saved; fourthly, that baptism of children is of none effect; fifthly, that the sacrament of Christ's body is but bread only; sixthly, that he who after baptism sinneth wittingly, sinneth deadly, and cannot be saved. Four-Fourton of teen of them were condemned: a man and a woman were burnt at Smithfield. remaining twolve were scattered among other towns, there to be burnt." The details are gone, 4-the

¹ Staw's Chronicle, p. $71.

I latimar alludes to the story with no disapproval of the execution of these men—as we should not have disapproved of it, if we had lived then, makes we had been Anabaptists currelves. A brave death, Latimos mays, is no proof of a good cause. "This is no good argument, my friends, this is a deceivable argument: he went to his death boldly—ergo, he standard in a just quarrel. The Anabaptists that were bornt here is divers tower in England (as I heard of credible men—I now them not my-names are gone. Poor Hollanders they were, and that is all. Scarcely the fact scenned worth the montion, so shortly it is told in a passing paragraph. For them no Europe was agitated, no courts were ordered into mourning, no papal hearts trembled with indignation. At their deaths the world looked on complacent, indifferent, or exulting. Yet here, too, out of twenty-five common men and women were found fourteen who, by no terror of stake or torture, could be tempted to say that they believed what they did not believe. History for them has no word of praise; yet They see as they, too, were not giving their blood in vain. We They too at they, too, were not giving their blood in vain.

After the execution of the Carthusians, it became a question what should be done with the Bishop represent of Rochester and Sir Thomas More. They had remained for a year in the Tower, undisturbed; and there is no reason to think that they would have been further troubled, except for the fault of one, if not of both. It appeared, however, on the trial of Father Reynolds, that Fisher's imprudence or return the reduced angerous matters. A correspondence had passed between the bishop and the king, on the Act of Supremacy, or on some subject connected with it. The king had taken no public notice of Fisher's words, but he self) west to their death introduce, as you will my; without my fear in the world — chearfully: well, let them go. There was in the old times emother kind of poisoned heretics that were called Donatists; and them because went to their execution as they should have gone to some july reseasion or banquet." — Latimer's Sermons, p. 180.

¹ He wrote to the king on the 14th of Jone, in consequence of an againstive at the Tower; but that letter could not have been spoken of on the frial of the Carthusians. — See State Propert, Vol. I. p. 431.

had required a promise that the letter should not be shown to any other person. The unwise old man gave his word, but he did not observe it; he sent copies both of what he had himself written and of the king's answer to the Sion monks,1 furnishing them at the same time with a copy of the book which he had written against the divorce, and two other books, written by Abel, the queen's confessor, and the Spanish ambusasdor. Whether he was discovered to have held any other correspondence, or whether anything of an analogous kind was proved against More, I am unable to discover. Both he and Fisher had been Tree tweet and condust. treated with greater indulgence than was are M lo bea in the room, usual with prisoners.2 Their own attendants had waited on them; they were allowed to receive

2 "I had the confessor alone in very secret communication concerning certain letters of Mr Fisher's, of which Father Reynolds made mention in his examination; which the said Fisher promised the King's Grace that he never showed to any other man, neither would. The said confessor bath confessed to use that the said Fisher sent to him, to the said Raynolds, and to one other brother of them, the copy of his said letters directed to the hing's Grace, and the copy of the hing's answer also. He hath knewledged to me also that the said Fisher sent unto these with the said copies a book of his, made in defines of the King's Grace's first marriage, and also Abel's book, and one other book made by the suspercess, pp. 46, 48.

suppose "-- Bedyllte transcall Bayercases of the Mountains, pp. 46, 48.

A letter is extant from hisber, in which he complained of suffering from the cold and from want of clothen. This must have been an accident. More was evidently treated well (see More a Lafe of More), and all the ercommunicate finely with their friends and to receive whatever comforts their friends were pleased to send them. The affectal statements as this subject are too positive and too minute to admit of a doubt. Cromwell writes thus to Camalin: "Carresthon marchaeti tractahanter humanium atque mitim quain our friend pro serum demoritis; par Region illis friends; proximorum colloquio et consectuding final. If florant illis appositi prescriptique ministri quae a viaculto immunes actea fides charceque intechat; id cibi genue acque conditionts at varitue et concedebantur que sorum habitudini ac trends sambiant, fini consequinci, acposes acque affines et anaci pudicabant area magis macamends." — State Papers, Val. VII p. 884.

visits from their relatives within the Tower walls, and to correspond with their families and friends.³ As a matter of course, under such circumstances, they must have expressed their opinions on the great subject of the day; and those opinions were made known throughout England, and, indeed, throughout Europe. Whether they did more than this, or whether they had only indirectly allowed their influence to be used against the government, must be left to conjecture. But the language of a document under the king's hand. speaks of their having given some cause of provocation, of no common kind; and this is confirmed commun by Cromwell, who was once deeply attached charges to More. "When they were in strait keeping," say the instructions to the Bishop of Hereford, "having nevertheless the prison at their liberties, they ceased not both to practise an insurrection within the realm, and also to use all the devices to them possible in outward parts, as well to defame and slander his Majesty, and his most virtuous doings and proceedings, as also to procure the impeachment and other destruction of his most royal person." 2 Cromwell speaks also of their having been engaged in definite schemes, the object of which was rebellion; and although we have here the ex parts statement of the government, and although such a charge would have been held to be justified by a proof that they had spoken generally against the Act of Supremacy, it may be allowed to prove that so far they were really guilty; and it is equally certain that for these two men to have spoken against the act was to have lent encouragement to the party of insurrection, the most powerful which that party could have received.

¹ Mozs's Lift of More.

² "Instructions given by the King's Majesty to the Right Reversed Father in God, his right trusty and well-beloved counseilor the Bishep of Hereford, whom his Majesty at this time sendeth unto the Princes of Garmany." — Rolls Horse MS.

A State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 636

Thus, by another necessity, Fisher and More, at the beginning of May, were called upon for their submission. It was a hard case, for the bishop was sinking into the grave with age and sickness, and More had the highest reputation of any living man. But they had chosen to make themselves conspicuous as confessors for Catholic truth; though prisoners in the Tower, they were in fact the most effectual champions of the papal claims; and if their disobedience had been passed over, the statute could have been enforced against no one.

The same course was followed as with the Carthusian monks. On the 7th of May a deputation of the council waited on the prisoners in tion of the sauacii waita the Tower, for an acknowledgment of the upos them p the Tower. supremacy. They refused: Fisher, after a They refuse to edmit the brief hesitation, peremptorily; More declining to answer, but also giving an indirect denial. After repeated efforts had been made to move them, and made in vain, their own language, as in the preceding trials, furnished material for their indictment; and the law officers of the crown who were to conduct the prosecution were the witnesses under whose evidence they were to be tried. It was a strange proceeding, to be excused only, if excused at all, by the pressure of the times.1

1 Compare State Papers, Vol. 1 pp. 431-436, with the Reports of the trials in the Buga de Socretie. Burnet has hastily stated that no Catholic was ever punished for merely denying the supremacy in official examinations. He has goes so far, indeed, as to call the assertions of Catholic writers in this effect "impudent falsehoods." Whether any Catholic via prese-

Either the king or his ministers, however, were slow in making up their minds. With the Carthusians, nine days only were allowed to elapse between the first examination and the final close at Tyburn. The case against More and Fisher was no less clear than against the monks; yet five weeks elapsed and the Thecomes government still hesitated. Perhaps they their trial were influenced by the high position of the greater offunders, - perhaps there was some fear of the world's opinion, which, though it might be indifferent to the secrifice of a few obscure occlesisation, yet would surely not pass over lightly the execution of men who stood out with so marked preëminence. The council board was unevenly composed. Cromwell, who divides with the king the responsibility of these prosecutions, had succeeded, not to the authority only of Wolsey, but to the hatred with which the ignoble plobeian was regarded by the patricians who were compelled to stoop before him. Lord Exeter was already looking with a cold eye on the revolution; and Norfolk and Suffolk, though sealous as the king himself for the independence of England, yet had all the instincts of aristocratic conservatism. Even Cromwell may have desired the triumph of winning over converts so distinguished, or may have shrunk from the odium which their deaths would bring upon him. Whatever was the cause of the delay, the privy council, who had been contented with a single examination of Haughton and his companions, struggled with their present difficulty weak serted who had not given other cause for suspicion, I do not know; but it is quite certain that Haughton and Fisher were condemned solely of the ground of their answers on these occasions, and that no other evidence was brought against them. The government clearly preferred this evidence as the most direct and unanswarshie, for in both those uses they might have produced other witnesses had they cared to do so.

after week; and it is possible that, except from an extraneous impulse, some mode of escape might have been discovered. But as the sentence of Clement scaled the fate of the Nun of Kent, so the unwisdom of his successor bore similarly fistal fruits.

Paul III. had throughout the spring flattered Henry with em ressions of sympathy, and had held out hopes of ar approaching change of policy. He chose the present unfortunate juncture to expose the varity of these professions; and as an intimation of the course which he intended to follow, he named the Bishop of Rochester, the one bishop who remained attached to Catherine's cause, a cardinal. Henry had appealed to a council, which the pope had promised to call; and The pope Fisher, of all Englishmen, was chosen as the person whom the pope desired to represent the nation on its assembly. Even the very conclave at Rome were taken by surprise, and expressed themselves in no measured terms at the impolicy of this most foolish action. Cassalis, aware of the effect which the news would produce in England, hurried to such friends as he possessed in the conclave to protest against the appointment. The king, he said, would inevitably regard it as injurious to the realm and insulting to himself; 1 and it was madness at such a moment to trifle with Henry's displeasure.

The Pope, alarmed at the expressions which he was told that Cassals had used, sent in haste to urge him,

^{1 &#}x27;Omnes Cardinales amicos nostros adivi; elegus demonstravi quam brases ac stalte fecerint in Roffensi in Cardinalem eligando unde et potentissimum Rogem et universum Regnum Angles mirum in medum ladunt et injurià adicumt; Roffensem cuim virum coc gloriosum ut propter vanam gloriam in sufi opinione centra Regem adhue sit permansurus; quil etiam de causà in carcere est et mort condemnatus." — Cassalie to Cronwell State Papera, Vol. VII. p. 804.

if possible, to allay the storm. He was not ashamed to stoop to falsehood — but falsehood too awk- compassion ward to deceive even the most willing credulity. He had thought, he said, of nothing abelood. but to please Henry. He had been urged by the King of France to seek a reconciliation with England, and in sending a hat to an English bishop he had meant nothing but a compliment. The general council would be held immediately; and it was desirable, according to the constitution of the church, that a cardinal of every nation should be present. He had no especial reason for choosing the Bishop of Rochester, except that he had a high reputation for learning, and he imagined, therefore, that the king would be gratified.1 "He implored me," Cassalis wrote, "to make his excuses to his Majesty, and to assure him how deeply he regretted his mistake, especially when I assured him that the step was of a kind which admitted of no excuse. 2

Cassalis himself was afterwards disposed to believe that the appointment was made in thoughtlessnoss, and that the pope at the moment had really forgotten Fisher's position. But this could gain no credit in England. The news reached the government in the middle of June, and determined the fate of the unfortunate bishop; and with it the fate, also, of The appointment is nobler companion. To the king, the Normalian pope's conduct appeared a defiance; and as a defiance he accepted it. In vain Fisher declared that he had not sought his ill-timed honours, and would not accept them. Neither his ignorance nor his refusal could avail h.m. Once more he was called upon to submit, with the intimation, that if he refused he must bear the consequences. His reply remained what it had lone 17 been; and on the 17th of June he was taken his trial are thus briefly summed up in the official record:—"Thursday after the feast of St. Barnabas, John Fisher was brought to the bar by Sir William had is con

State Papera, Vol. VII. p. 604.

Portion me volumenter regavit, at vias omnes tentare velim, quibas tpud Regiam Majestatem excuentam hanc rem faciam, unde se plurimum dolore dixit, cum presentim ego affirmaverim rem esce ejuamodi at excuentionem non recipiat. — Cascalis to "rotawall: ibid

² Ibid. p. 016

Months con
Angston, Constable of the Tower. Pleads not guilty. Venire awarded. Verdict—guilty. Judgment as usual in cases of treason." **

It was a swift sentence, and swiftly to be executed. Five days were allowed him to prepare himself; and the more austere features of the penalty were remitted with some show of pity. He was to die by the axe.

Morey was not to be hoped for. It does not seem to have been sought. He was past eighty. The earth on the edge of the grave was already crumbling under his feet; and death had little to make it fearful. When the last morning dawned, he dressed himself carefully—as he said, for his marriage-day. The distance to Tower Hill was short. He was had be able to walk; and he tottered out of the prison-gates, holding in his hand a closed volume of the New Testament. The crowd flocked about him, and he was heard to pray that, as this book had been his best comfort and companion, so in that hour it might give him some special strength, and meak to him as from his Lord. Then opening it at a venture, he read: "This is life eternal, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast ment." It was the answer to his prayer; and he contipued to repeat the words as he was led forward. the scaffold he chanted the To Dours, and then, after a few prayers, knelt down, and meekly laid his head upon a pillow where neither care nor fear nor sickness would ever yet it more. Many a spectacle of sorrow had been witnessed on that tragic spot, but never one more sad than this; never one more painful to think or speak of. When a nation is in the threes of revelution, wild spirits are abroad in the storm; and poor human nature presses blindly forward with the burden which is la d upon it, tossing aside the obstacles in its path with a recklessness which, in calmer hours, it would fear to contemplate.

¹ Historia Hortyrum Anglorum.

² Report of the Trial of John Fisher. Baga de Secretie: Appendix to the Third Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Records.

Sir Thomas More followed, his fortunes linked in death as in life to those of his friend. He was left to the last— in the hope, perhaps, that the example might produce an effect which persuasion could not. But the example, if that was the object, worked to far other purpose. From More's high-tempered nature, such terrors fell harmless, as from enchanted armour. Death to him was but a passing from one country to another: and he had all along anticipated that his prison was the antechamber of the scaffold. He had, indeed, taken no pains to avoid it. The king, according to the unmispicious evidence of his daughter, Margaret Royer, had not accused him without cause of exciting a spirit of reastance. He had spent his time in encouraging Catholics to persevers to martyrdom for their faith In his many conversations with herself, he had expressed himself with all freedom, and to others he had doubtless spoken as plainly as to her.3

On the 7th of May he was examined by the same persons who examined Fisher; and he was interrogated again and again in subsequent interviews. His humour did not allow him to answer questions directly: he played with his catechists, and did not readily furaish them with materials for a charge. He had corresponded with Fisher in prison, on the conduct which he meant to pursue. Some of these letters had been burnt; but others were in the hands of the government, and would have been sufficient to sustain the prosecution, but they preferred his own words from his own lips. At length sufficient evidence June 26 A true bill Brind was obtained. On the 26th of June, a true Champs bill was found against him by the Grand Mose. Jury of Middlesex; and on the 1st of July the High Commission sat again in Westminster Hall. to try the most illustrious prisoner who ever listened to his sentence there.9 He walked from the Tower - feebly, however, and with to the bor-

If his opinious had been menticient for his destruction, there was an influence at court which left no hope to him; the influence of one whose ways and doings were better known than they have been known to ber modern admirers. "On a time," writes his grandson, "when he had questioned my aux Roper of his wife and children and the state of his boase in his absence he asked her at last how Queen Anna did. 'In faith, father, and she, never better. There is nothing clee at the court but dencing and sporting." Never better?" said he; 'also, Meg, also, it pitieth use to remember auto what misery she will shortly come. These dances of hem will prove such dances that she will spurp our heads off like bothalls, but it will not be long are her head will dance the like dance." "--- More's Life of More, p. 244.

2 The compension of the commission is remarkable. When Fisher was brief, Lord Exeter sets upon it. On the trial of More, Lord Exeter was sheent, but his place was taken by his couple, Lord Montague, Regitaid Poin's eldest brother, and Lady Salusbury's non. Willingly or unwillingly the opposition nobles were made parterious orients in both these exeru.

Mans.

a stick, for he was weak from long confinement. appearing at the bar, a chair was brought for him, and he was allowed to sit. The indictment was then read by the attorney-general. It set forth that Sir Thomas More, traitorously imagining and attempting to deprive the king of his title as supreme Head of the Church, did, on the 7th of May, when examined before Thomas Cromwell, the king's principal secretary, and divers other persons, whether he would accept the king as Head on earth of the Church of England, pursuant to the statute, refuse to give a direct answer, but replied, "I will not meddle with any such matters, for I am fully determined to serve God and to think upon His passion, and my passage out of this world." 1 He was then energed with having written to Fisher subtant that " The act of parliament was like a sword dismost with two edges; for if a man answered one way it would confound his soul, and if the other way it would confound his body." Finally and chiefly, he had spoken treasonable words in the Tower to Rich, the solicitor-general. Rich had endeavoured to persuade him, as Cranmer had endeavoured in his previous difficulty at Lambeth, that it was his duty as a subject to obey the law of the land. "Supposing it was enacted by act of parliament," the solicitor-general had said, "that I, Richard Rich, should be king, and that it should be treason to deny it, what would be the offence if you, Sir Thomas More, were to say that I was king?" More had answered that, in his conscience, he would be bound by the act of parliament, and would be

¹ I take my account of the indictment from the government record. It is, therefore, their own statement of their own case. — Trial of Sir Thomas Morex Baga de Secretae, peach 7, hundle 3.

^{*} Fisher had unhappily used these words on his own examination; and the identity of language was held a proof of traitorous confederacy.

You is:

24

obliged to accept Rich as king. He would put another case, however. "Suppose it should be enacted by parliament, quod Deus non suset Deus, and that opposing the act should be treason, if it were asked of him, Richard Rich, whether he would say Quod Deus non erat Deus, according to this statute, and if he were to say No, would be not offend?" Rich had replied. "Cortainly, because it is impossible, quod Deus non esset Deus: but why, Master More, can you not accept the king as chief Head of the Church of England, just as you would that I should be made king, in which case you agree that you would be obliged to acknowledge me as king?" "To which More, persevering in his treasons, had answered to Rich, that the cases were not similar, because the king could be made by parliament and deprived by parliament; but in the first case the subject could not be obliged, because his consent could not be given for that in parliament."

This was the substance of the indictment. As soon the chancel as it was read, the lord chancellor rose, and to subsite told the prisoner that he saw how grievously he had offended the king; it was not too late to ask for mercy, however, which his Majesty desired to show.

"My lord," More replied, "I have great cause to the trace, thank your honour for your courtesy, but I may continue beseech Almighty God that I may continue in the mind that I am in through His grace unto death.' To the charges against him he pleaded not guilty," and answered them at length. He could not say indeed that the facts were not true; for although he denied that he had "practised" against the supremacy, he could not say that he had consented to it, or that he ever would consent; but like the Prior of the Charterhouse, he could not admit himself guilty when he had only obeyed his conscience. The jury retired to consider, and in a quarter of Toolory and an hour returned with their verdict. chancellor, after receiving it, put the usual question, what the prisoner could say in arrest of judgment. More replied, but replied with a plea which it was impossible to recognise, by denouncing the statute under which he was tried, and insisting on the obligation of obedience to the see of Rome. Thus the sentence was inevitable. It was pronounced in the ordinary form; but the usual punishment for treason was commuted, as it had been with Fisher, to death upon the scaffold; and this last favour was communicated as a special instance of the royal elemency. More's wit was always ready. "God forbid," he answered, "that the king should show any more such mercy unto any of my friends; and God bless all my posterity from such pardons." 1

If this was the constitutional theory, "divine right" was a Stuart Sc.

The pageant was over, for such a trial was little more. As the procession formed to lead back the "condemned traitor" to the Tower, the commissioners once more adjured him to have pity on himself, and offered to reopen the court if he would reconsider his resolution. More smiled, and replied only a few words of graceful farewell.

"My lords," he said, "I have but to say that, like as the blessed Apostle St. Paul was present Blesset words to the at the death of the martyr Stephen, keeping commission their clothes that stoned him, and yet they be now both saints in heaven, and there shall continue friends for ever, so I trust, and shall therefore pray, that though your lordships have been on earth my judges, yet we may bereafter most in heaven together to our everlasting salvation; and God preserve you all, especially my sovereign lord the king, and grant him faithful councillors."

1 Mare's Life of More, p. 271

He then left the hall, and to spare him the exertion of the walk he was allowed to return by to the Tower, water. At the Tower stairs one of those scenes occurred which have east so rich a pathos round the closing story of this illustrious man. "When Sir Thomas," writes the grandson, "was now come to the Tower wharf, his best beloved child, my aunt Roper, desirous to see her father, whom she feared Margaret. she should never see in this world after, to have his last blessing, gave there attendance to meet him; whom as soon as she had espied she ran hastily unto him, and without consideration or care for herself, passing through the midst of the throng and guard of men, who with bills and halberts compassed him round, there openly in the sight of them all embraced him, and took him about the neck and kissed him, not able to say any word but 'Oh, my father! oh, my father!' He, liking well her most natural and dear affection towards him, gave her his fatherly blessing; telling her that whatsoever he should suffer, though he were innocent, yet it was not without the will of God; and that He knew well enough all the secrets of her heart, counselling her to accommodate her will to God's blessed pleasure, and to be patient for his loss.

"She was no tooner parted from him, and had got e scarce ten steps, when she, not satisfied with the former farewell, like one who had forgot herself, raveabed with the entire love of so worthy a father, having meither respect to herself nor to the press of people about him, suddenly turned back, and ran hastily to him, and took him about the neck and divers times together kissed him; whereat he spoke not a word, but carrying still his gravity, tears fell also from his eyes; yea, there were very few in all the troop who could refrain hereat from weeping, no, not the guard themselves. Yet at last with a full heart she was severed from him, at which time another of our women embraced him; and my aunt's maid Dorothy Collis did the like, of whom he said after, it was homely but very lovingly done. All these and also my grandfather witnessed that they smelt a most odoriferous smell to come from him, according to that of Isaac, 'The scent of my son is as the scent of a field which the Lord has blessed.'"!

More's relation with this daughter forms the most beautiful feature in his history. His letters The lattery to her in early life are of unequalled grace, and she was perhaps the only person whom he very deeply loved. He never saw her again. The four days which remained to him he spent in prayer and in severe bodily discipline. On the night of the 5th of July, although he did not know the time which had been fixed for his execution, yet with an instinctive feeling that it was near, he sent her his hair shirt and whip, as having no more need for them, with a parting blessing of affection.

He then lay down and slept quietly. At daybreak he was awoke by the entrance of Sir Thomas Pope, who had come to confirm his anticipations, and to tell him it was the king's pleasure that he should suffer at nine o'clock that morning. He received the news with utter composure. "I am much bounden to the king," he said, "for the benefits and nonours he has bestowed upon me; and so help me God, most of all am I bounden to him that it pleaseth his Majesty to rid me so shortly out of the miseries of this present world."

1 Mass's Life of Mars, pp. 276, 277.

Pope told him the king desired that he would not "use many words on the scaffold." "Mr. Pope," he answered, "you do well to give me warning, for otherwise I had purposed somewhat to have spoken; but no matter wherewith his Grace should have cause to be offended. Howbeit, whatever I intended, I shall obey his Highness's command."

He afterwards discussed the arrangements for his funeral, at which he begged that his family might be present; and when all was settled. Pope rose to leave him. He was an old friend. He took More's hand and wrung it, and quite overcome, burst into tears.

"Quiet yourself, Mr. Pope," More said, "and be not discomforted, for I trust we shall once see each other full merrily, when we shall live and love together in eternal bliss." 1

As soon as he was alone he dressed in his most elaborate costume. It was for the benefit, he said, of the executioner who was to do him so great a service. Sir William Kingston remonstrated, and with some difficulty induced him to put on a plainer suit; but that his intended liberality should not fail, he sent the man a gold angel in compensation, "as a token that he maliced him nothing, but rather loved him extremely."

A "And, further to put him from his melancholy, Sir Thomas More did take his urinal, and cast his water, saying merrily, 'I see no danger but the man that owns this water may live longer, if it please the king?" — More's Life, p. 288. I cannot allow myself to suppress a trait so eminently characteristic.

"So about aine of the clock he was brought by the Lieutenant out of the Tower, his heard being the laws long, which fashion he had never before used, the Tower his face pale and lean, carrying in his hands a red cross, casting his eyes often towards heaven." He had been unpopular as a judge, and one or two persons in the crowd were insolent to him; but the distance was short and soon over, as all else was nearly over now.

The scaffold had been awkwardly erected, and shook as he placed his foot upon the ladder. "See on the suit me safe up," he said to Kingston. "For my bld. coming down I can shift for myself." He began to speak to the people, but the sheriff begged him not to proceed, and he contented himself with asking for their prayers, and desiring them to bear witness for him that he died in the faith of the holy Catholic church, and a faithful servant of God and the king. He then repeated the Miserere pealm on his knees; and when he had ended and had risen, the executioner, with an emotion which promised ill for the manner in which his part in the tragedy would be accomplished, begged his forgiveness. More kissed him. "Thou art to do me the greatest benefit that I can receive," he said. "Pluck up thy spirit, man, and be not afraid to do thing office. My neck is very short. Take heed therefore that then strike not away for saving of thine honesty." The executioner offered to tie his eyes. "I will cover them myself," he said; and binding them in a cloth which he had brought with him, he knelt and laid his head upon the block. The fatal stroke was about to fall, when he signed for a moment's delay while he moved aside his beard. "Pity that should be cut," he murmured, " that has not commitperhaps ever uttered at such a time, the lips most famous through Europe for elequence and wisdom closed for ever.

"So," concludes his biographer, "with alacrity and spiritual joy he received the fatal axe, which no sooner had severed the head from the body, but his soul was carried by angels into everlasting glory, where a crown of martyrdom was placed upon him which can never fade nor decay, and then he found those words true which he had often spoken, that a man may lose his head and have no harm."

This was the execution of Sir Thomas More, an act which was sounded out into the far corners of the earth, and was the world's wonder as well for the circumstances under which it was perpetrated, as for the preternatural composure with which it was borne. Something of his calmness may have been due to his natural temperament, something to an unaffected weariness of a world which in his eyes was plunging into the ruin of the latter days. But those fair hues of sunny cheerfulness caught their colour from the simplicity of his faith; and never was there a Christian's victory over death more grandly evidenced than in that last scene lighted with its lambent humour.

History will rather dwell upon the incidents of the execution than attempt a sentence upon those who willed that it should be. It was at once most piteous and most inevitable. The hour of retribution had come at length, when at the hands of the Reman church was to be required all the righteous blood which it had shed, from the blood of Raymond of Toulouse to the Hood of the last victim who had blackened into ashes at Smithfield. The voices crying underneath the altar had been heard upon the throne of the Most High, and woe to the generation of which the dark account had been demanded.

Merc's Life of More, p. 257.

In whatever light, however, we may now think of these things, the effect in Europe was instan- me effect of taneous and electrical. The uritation which there is had accompanied the excommunication by Bange Clement had died away in the difficulty of executing the censures. The papal party had endeavoured to persuade themselves that the king was acting under a passing caprice. They had believed that the body of the people remained essentially Catholic; and they had trusted to time, to discontent, to mutiny, to the consequences of what they chose to regard as the mere indulgence of criminal passion, to bring Henry to his To threats and anathemas, therefore, had again succeeded fair words and promises, and intrigues and flatteries; and the pope and his advisers, so long accustomed themselves to promise and to mean nothing, to fulminate censures in form, and to treat human life as a foolish farce upon the stage, had dreamed that others were like themselves. In the rough awakening out of their delusion, as with a stroke of lightning, popes, cardinals, kings, emperors, ambassadors, were startled into seriousness; and, the dipformatic meshwork all rent and broken, they fell at once each into their places, with a sense suddenly forced upon them that it was no child's play any longer. The King of England was in earnest, it seemed. The assumption of the supremacy was a fixed purpose, which he was prepared to make a question of life and death; and with this resolution they most thenceforward make their account.

١

On the 1st of June. Cassalis wrote 1 from Rome The news that the French ambassador had received a Boms of the letter concerning certain friars who had been but to death in England for denying the king to be Head of the Church. The letter had been read in the consistory, and was reported to be written in a tone of the deepest commiseration. been much conversation about it, the French bishops having been louder than any in their denunciations; and the form of the execution was described as having been most barbarous. Some of the cardinals had said that they envied the monks their deaths in such a cause, and wished that they had been with them. "I desired my informant," Cassalis said, " to suggest to these cardinals, that, if they were so anxious on the subject, they had better pay a visit to England." And he concluded, in cipher, " I cannot tell very well what to think of the French. An Italian told me he had heard the Most Christian king himself say, that although he was obliged to press upon the pope the requests of the king of England, yet that these requests were preposterous, and could not be granted."

The deaths of a few poor monks would soon have Act of Pale been forgiven; the execution of Fisher first the pope will really revealed the truth. No sooner was the pope will the terrible reply of Henry to his promotion to the cardinalate made known than the conclusion of the cardinalate made known than the conclusion of clave was instantly summoned. Cardinal Tournon described the scene upon the scaffold in language which moved all his audience to tears. The pope, in a paroxysm of anger, declared that if he had seen his own nephews murdered in his presence, it would not have so much affected him; and Cassalia said he heard, from good authority, that they would do their worst, and intended to make the Bishop of Rochester's death of more account than that of the martyr St. Thomas.1

² State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 606.

Canadia to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. VI7 pp. 620, 621.

Nor was the anger or the surprise confined to Rome Through England, through France, through All Russia Flanders, even among the Protestants of antes in Germany, there rose a simultaneous outcry phasure. of autonishment. Rumour flew to and fro with a thousand falsehoods; and the unfortunate leaven of the Anne Boleyn marriage told fatally to destroy that appearance of probity of motive so inclispensable to the defence of the government. Even Fran- Practicecis I, forgot his caution, and dared to remon strate. He wrote to entreat his good brother in future to content himself for the future with hanishing such offenders, and sparing the extrem- mainted. ity of his penalties.

Unfortunately, the question which was at issue was European as well as English; and every exile who was driven from England would have become, like Reginald Pole, a missionary of a holy war against the infidel king. Whatever else might have been possible. banishment was more perilous than pardon.

But the indignation was so general and so serious. that Henry thought it well to offer an explana- Hour onetion of his conduct, both at home and abroad, explanation. With his own people he communicated through the lay authorities, not choosing to trust himself on this occasion to the clergy. The magistrates at the quarter sessions were directed "to declare to the people the treasons committed by the late Bishop of Rochester and Sir Thomas More; who thereby, and by divers secret practices, of their malicious minds intended to seminate, engender, and breed a most mischievous and seditions opinion, not only to their own confusion, but also of divers others, who have lately suffered execution according to their demerits." 1 To Francis, Cromwell instructed Gardiner, who was ambassador in Paris, to reply very haughtily. The English government, he said, had acted on clear proof of treason; treason so manifest, and tending so clearly to the total destruction of the commonwealth of the realm. that the condemned persons "were well worthy, if they had a thousand lives, to have suffered ten times a more terrible death and execution than any of them did suffer." The laws which the king have on good had made were "not without substantial and columns, grounds; " but had been passed " by great and mature advice, counsel, and deliberation of the whole policy of the realm, and" were "indeed no new laws, but of great antiquity, now renovate and renewed in respect to the common weal of the same realm."

1 State Papers, Vol. VII pp. 620, 621.

With respect to the letter of the King of France, And be much Gardiner was to say, it was " not a little to eurprised. Upst im his Highness's marvel that the Freuch king stepad 🖿 would ever counsel or advise him, if in case at heartha banish bis hereafter any such like offenders should hapemi kera. giving them in pen to be in the realm, that he should rather portunity to banish them, than in such wise execute them, Now blm. . . . supposing it to be neither the office of a friend nor a brother, that he would counsel the King's Highness to banish his traitors into strange parts, where they might have good occasion, time, place, and opportunity to work their feats of treason and conspiracy the better against the king and this his realin. In which part," concluded Cromwell, "ye shall somewhat engrieve the matter, after such sort that it may well appear to the French king that the King's Highness may take those his counsels both strangely and unkindly."

Strype's Memor. Ecoles., Vol. I., Appendix, p. 211. These words are surious as directly uttributing the conduct of the monks to the influence of Mere and Fisher.

With the German princes Henry was scarcely less imperious; I and it is noteworthy that the missisterals most elaborate defence which he condescended to make is that which was sent to Sir Greg-majorate the page ory Cassalis, to be laid before the page. He chose that the Roman court should understand distinctly the grounds on which he had acted; and this despatch (which was written by Cromwell) shows more clearly

I Cremwell to Gardiner: Burnet's Collectones, pp. 469, 461.

^{9 &}quot; If the Duke of Sane, or any of the other princes, shall in their seqforegoe with him, expostalate or show theories of displeased with such laformation as they may porcess have had, touching the attender and execution of the late Kinhop of Rochester and Sir Thomas Mora, the and Bishop shall thereints answer and say, that the same were by order of ble laws found to be false treiters and rebels to his Highness and his crown. The order of whose attaileder with the causes thereof, he may decince unto them, saying that in case the King's Highness should know that they west d conceive any unister opinion of his Grace, for the doing of any act with a his realts, his Grace should not only have cause to think they need not with him the office of freedship, which would not by any report concerns other epition of so noble a prince as he is then were both just and homograph able, but also to note in them less constancy of judgment than he verice thinketh they have. And hereupon the said limbor shall descante these from groung execut to any seels report, as whereby they shall offend God in the judgment of evil upon their neighbour, and cause its Majorty to races that they would of him, being a prince of hosour conceive may other opinion than his honour and friendship towards them doth require. Setting this firth with such a stomach and courage as they may not only perces to the false traiterous dealings of the sand persons; but consider what folly at yers in them upon light report to judge of another prince's proceedings otherwise than they would a foreign prince should judge of them: " — instructions to the Bushep of Hemfurd by the Kang's Highness: Rolls House MA than any other state paper which remains to us, the light in which the reforming party desired their conduct to be regarded.

It was written in reply to the letter in which Cassalis reported the irritation of the Roman court, and enters into the whole ground of complaint against More and Fisher.

Highness the purport of your late letters, and as they contained many things which were very welcome to his Majesty, so he could not sufficiently marvel that the pope should have conceived so great offence at the deaths of the Bishop of Rochester and Sir Thomas More. And albeit his Majesty is not bound to render account of his actions except to God, whom in thought and deed he is ever desirous to obey; nevertheless that his royal name may not be evil spoken of by malicious tongues, from want of knowledge of the truth, I will tell you briefly what has been done in this matter.

"After that his Majesty, with the favour and assistance of Almighty God, had brought his cause to an end, by the consent and authority of unprejudiced persons of the most approved learning in Christendom, and after he had confirmed it by the very rule of truth, these men, who had looked to see a far different conclusion, finding now no hopes of disturbing the settlement thus made, began to meditate other purposes.

Fisher and hiere had obstructed the reforma which had been introduced into the runtes. And when our good king, according to his princely duty, was devising measures for the quiet and good order of the realm, and for the correction of manners now largely faller to decay, this, so great a benefit to the commonweal, they did, so far as in them lay, endeavour, though without effect, under pretence of dissembled honesty, to obstruct and oppose. Manifest proofs of their wicked designs were in the hands of the King's Grace; but his Majesty consented rather to pass over their offence without notice, hoping to recall them to a better mind, as having before been in some good estimation with him.

But they in whom ambitton, love of self, and a peculiar conceit of wisdom had bred another persuasion, obstinately abused this kindness of their most noble prince. And when on a through persuasion day there was order issued for the assembly of the great council of the realm, they made secret inquiry to learn the measures which would there be treated of. Whatsoever they discovered or conjectured, forthwith they debated in private council among themselves, arriving upon each point at conclusions other than those which the interests of the realm did require; and they fortified those conclusions with such array of arguments and reasons, that with no great labour the ignorant people might have been dangerously deceived.

"At length knowing that they had incurred the king's displeasure, and fearing lest they might fail of accomplishing their purposes, they chose out persons on whose courage, readiness, and devotion to themselves they could depend; and taking these men into their councils, they fed them with the poison which they had conceived, forgetting their allegiance to their king, and their duty to their country."

Thus were their seditions opinions scattered from letter or the country. And when his Highness country began to trace this impious conspiracy to its source, Sir Thomas More and the Bishop of Rochester were found to be the undoubted authors of the same : and their guilt was proved against them by the evidence of their own handwrit, and the confessions of their own lips. For these causes, therefore, and for many others of like kind, our most gracious severeign was compelled to imprison them as rebellious subjects, as disturbers of the public peace, and as movers of sedition and tumult. Nor was it possible for him to do other than punish them, unless, after their crimes had been detected, he had so far forgotten his duty as to leave the contagion to spread unchecked, to the utter destruction of the nation. They were in consequence They had to thrown into the Tower, where, however, their BOGGOOD WOODED treatment was far different from what their poer committed to the Tower, where demerits had deserved; they were allowed the society of their friends; their own sertreated with vants were admitted to attend upon them. Madness. and they received all such indulgences in food and dress as their families desired. Clemency, however, produced no effect on persons in whom duty and allegiance had given place to treason and makes.

A It will be observed that many important facts are alluded to in this letter, of which we have no other knowledge.

Kindpess had, how per, prohat, they had centinped to obstruct the government ; and had the miture been tried and over femned by the ordinary laws of the Piniilii chose rather to persist in their wicked courses than to make trial by repentance of the king's goodness. For after that certain laws had been decreed by authority of parliament, and had been by the whole nation admitted and accepted as expedient for the realm, and agreeable to true religion, they alone refused their consent to these laws, hoping that something might occur to sustain them in their impicty; and while professing to have left all care and thought for human things, they were considering by what arguments, in furtherance of their sed tious purposes, they might, to the common hurt, elude, refute, and disturb the said laws.

"Of this their treason there are proofs extant—letters written, when ink failed them, with chalk or charcoal, and passed secretly from one to the other. Our most merciful king could therefore no longer tolerate their grievous faults. He allowed them to be tried by process of ordinary law. They were found guilty of high treason, and sentenced to death. Their punishment was milder than that which the law prescribed, or which their crimes had deserved; and many persons have by this example been brought to a better mind." 1

To Cromwell evidently the case appeared so clear as to require no apology. To modern writers it has appeared so clear as to admit of none. The value of the defence turns upon the point of the actual danger to the state, and the extent to which the conduct of the sufferers imperilled the progress of the Reformation. As written for the eyes of the pope and cardinals, however, such a letter could be understood only as daring them to do their worst. It ignored the very existence of such rules of judgment as the heads of the Roman church would alone acknowledge, and represented the story as it appeared from the position which England had assumed on its revolt from its old allegiance.

There were no more false efforts at conciliation, and open war thenceforth appeared to be the only Thereply of possible relation between the papacy and the population Henry VIII. Paul III. replied, or designed to reply, with his far-famed bull of interdict and deposition, which, though reserved at the moment in deference to Francis of France, and not issued till three years later, was composed in the first burst of his displeasure.1 The substance of his voluminous anathemas may be thus briefly epitomized.

1 Crots well to Cassalia: State Papers, Vol. VII. p. 635.

The pope, quoting and applying to himself the words the beat of Jeremiah, "Behold, I have set thee over interdict and beyondtoo. nations and kingdoms, that thou mayest root out and destroy, and that thou mayest plant and build again," addressed Henry as a disobedient vassal. Already lying under the censures of the church, he had zone on to heap crime on crime; and therefore, a specific number of days being allowed him to repent and make his submission, at the expiration of this period of respite the following sentence was to take effect.

The king, with all who abetted him in his crimes, was pronounced accursed out off from the body of Christ, to perish. When he died, his body should lie without burial; his soul, blasted with anathema, should be cast into hell for ever. The lands of his subjects who remained faithful to him were laid under an interdict: their children were disinherited, their marriages illegal, their wills invalid; only by one condition could they escape their fate - by instant rebellion against the apostate prince. All officers of the crown were absolved from their oaths; all subjects, secular or ecclesiastic, from their allegiance. The entire nation, under penalty of excommunication, was commanded no longer to acknowledge Henry as their sovereign. 1 No true son of the church should hold intercourse with him or his adherents. They must neither trade with them, speak with them, nor give them food. The clergy, leaving behind a few of their number to baptize the new-born infants, were to withdraw from the accursed land, and return no more till it had submitted. If the king, trusting to force, persevered in his iniquity, the lords and commons of England, dukes, marquises, earls, and all other persons, were required, under the same penalty of excommunication, to expel him from the throne; and the Christian princes of Europe were called on to show their fidelity to the Holy See, by aiding in so godly a work.

¹ Paul himself said that it was reserved at the intercession of the Princes of Europe. Intercession is too mild a word for the species of interference which was exerted. The pope sent a draft of the intended bull to France; and the king having me disposition to combinence exaggerated views of papal authority, spoke of it as impariently many quotions brown and said that he must send the Cardinal of Lorenne to Rome, to warn his Holinson that his protonce of seiting himself above princes could by no means no allowed; by such impotent threats he raight not only do no good, but he would make bi-neelf a laughing-stock to all the world. - Christopher Mount to Henry VIII.: State Papers, Vol. VIL p. 498.

In conclusion, as the king had commanded his clergy to preach against the pope in their churches, so the pope commanded them to retaliate upon the king, and with bell, book, and candle declare him cursed.

This was loud thunder; nor, when abetted by Irish massacres and English treasons, was it altogether impotent. If Henry's conceptions of the royal supremacy was not more modest in its self-assertion; and the language of Paul III. went far to justify the rough measures by which his menaces were parried. If any misgiving had remained in the king's mind on the legitimacy of the course which he had pursued, the last trace of it must have been obliterated by the perusal of this preposterous bombast.

¹ His sub excommunicationis pend mandamus at ab sjunden Henrici regis, snorumque officialium judicium et magistratuum quorumeunque shedientit, penitus et amulae recedent, nec liios in superiores recegnosement neque illerum mandatis obtemperent.— Bull of Pope Paul against Henry VIII.

For the moment, as I said, the bull was suspended through the interference of Francis. But Henry's Francis remained in communion with the See of Rome: Francis was at that moment labouring to persuade the Lutheran states in Germany to return to communion with it: and Henry knew, that, although in their hearts the European powers might estimate the pope's pretences at their true value, yet the bull of excommunication might furnish a convenient and dangerous pretext against him in the event of a Catholic combination. His position was full of peril; and in spite of himself, he was driven once more to seek for an alliance among the foreign Protestants, before the French intrigues should finally anticipate him.

That he really might be too late appeared an immetaken of diste likelihood. The quarrel between the harmonic Lutherana and the followers of Zwingli, the Anabaptist anarchy and the increasing confusion throughout the Protestant states, had so weighed on Luther's spirit that he was looking for the end of all things and the coming of Christ; and although Luther himself never quailed, too many "murmurers in the wilderness" were looking wistfully back into Egypt.
The French king, availing himself skilfully of the turning tide, had sent the Bishop of Paris to the courts of Saxony and Bavaria, in the beginning of August, to feel his way towards a reconciliation; and his efforts had been attended with remarkable success.

The bishop had been in communication with Me rectability lancthon and many of the leading Lutheran theologians upon the terms on which they the Latter would return to the church. The Protestant divines had drawn up a series of articles, the first of which was a prefession of readiness to recognise the authority of the pope; I accompanying this statement with a declaration that they would accept any terms not plainly unjust and improus. These articles were transmitted to Paris, and again retransmitted to Germany, with every prespect of a mutually satisfactory result; and Melancthon was waiting only till the bishop could accompany him, to go in person to Paris, and consult with the Sorbonne.2

This momentary (for it was only momentary) weakness of the German Protestants was in part of which owing to their want of confidence in Henry VIII.8 The king had learnt to entertain a respect for the foreign Reformers, far unlike the repugnance of earlier years; but the prospect of an alliance with them had hitherto been too much used by him as a weapon with which to menace the Catholic powers, whose friendship he had not concealed that he would prefer. The Protestant princes had shrunk therefore,

The Venetian Ambassador teld Mount that the first article stood thus, "Admittitur Protestes Postificia Maximal absolute;" to which Mount says be answered, "Hoc Latinum magis sepit Sorbonam Parisiensem quam Witenbergensem Minervam." Du Bellay afterwards said that the saving clause was attached to it, "Mede accundum verbam Del omnia judicet;" and that thus had been added at the desire of the French king; which Mount did not believe — and indeed found great difficulty in discovering any credible account of what was really taking place, beyond the fact that the lutheruns were so anxious for an agreement, that they were walking with open eyes into a net which would atrangle them. — Son State Propose, Vol. VII. p. 620, &c.

² lbid.

^{*} Ego colenciesimo Patrone (si scribere licet quod sentio) non sibil accere pute amichin incundo et confirmando inter serenizimum Regen nostrum et Principes Garmanos, miniam neromanial Ragis nostri predentimu. Germanorum anumi tales sunt ut apertam et simplicum amicitism colunt et experiant. Ego queque Germanon Principes super hão causă serpius expostulantes audivi, et qui emperana hane et exumiriam amicitism not satis probarent. Dixeruntenim bâc re fieri ut plerique alia fectus secum hure detrectarent et rafugacunt qui id ultro factum fuerant si serenissimum Anglia Begun aperte stare comurent. Mount to Cromwell: Rede Papera, Vol. VII p. 626.

1

and wisely, from allowing themselves to be made the instruments of worldly policy; and the efforts at a combination had hitherto been illusive and ineffectual. Danger now compelled the king to change his hesitation into more honest advances. If Germany accepted the mediation of Francis, and returned to communion with Rome; and if, under the circumstances of a reunion, a general council were assembled; there could be little doubt of the attitude in which a council, called together under such auspices, would place itself towards the movement in England. To escape so imminent a peril, Henry was obliged (as Elizabeth after Henry la Iriven to him) to seek the support of a party from eopei llata the German which he had shrunk . he was forced, in spite of himself, to identify his cause with the true cause of freedom, and consequently to admit an enlarged toleration of the Reformed doctrines in his own dominions. There could be little doubt of the support of the Gormans, if they could be once assured that they would not again be trifled with; and a Protestant league, the steady object of Cromwell's efforts, seemed likely at length to be realized.

Different indeed would have been the future, both of England and for Germany, if such a league had been possible, if the pressure which compelled this most natural alliance had continued till it had cemented into rock. But the Tudors, representatives in this, as in so any other features of their character, of the matter of the relations people whom they governed, could never conditional people whom they governed, could never conditional relations which permitted resistance to authority, and which they regarded as anarchic and revolutionary. They consented, when no alternative was left them, to endure for short periods a state of doubtful corditality;

Google

ong PENN

but the connexion was terminated at the earliest moment which safety permitted; in their hatred of disorder (for this feeling is the key alike to the strength and to the weakness of the Tudor family), they preferred the incongruities of Anglicanism to a complete reformation; and a " midge-madge " 1 of contradictory formularies to the simplicity of the Protestant faith. In estentials, the English movement was political rather than spiritual. What was gained for the faith, we owe first to Providence, and then to those accidents, one of which had now arisen, which compelled at intervals a deeper and a broader policy. To counteract the Business of the French emissaries, Christopher Mount, in Hornord to August, and in September, Fox, Bishop of the Preset. Hereford, were despatched to warn the Lutheran princes against their intrigues, and to point out the course which the interests of Northern Europe in the existing conjuncture required. The bishop's instructions were drawn by the king. He was to proceed direct to the court of Saxony, and, after presenting his letters of credit, was to address the elector to the following effect:

"Besides and beyond the love, amity, and friendship which noble blood and progeny had carnally Bear's the caused and continued in the heart of the carton of King's Highness towards the said duke and his progenitors, and besides that kindness also which of late by mutual communication of gratuities had been not a little augmented and increased between them, there was also stirred up in the heart of the King's Highness a spiritual love and favour towards the said duke and his virtuous intents and proceedings,

I This was Lord Burlaigh's word for the constitution of the English Church.

for that the said duke persisted and continued in his most virtuous mind to set forth, maintain, and defend the sincere teaching of the gospel and the perfect true

Me derives, in consensor with other prioces who Beure Childre ad board, 60 maintein the middle way of I ruth, meevening to God a word.

understanding of the word of God. In that matter the King's Highness, also illuminated with the same spirit of truth, and wholly addict and dedicate to the advancement thereof. had employed great pain and travail to bring the same to the knowledge of his people and aubjects, intending also further and further to proceed therein, as his Grace by good consultation should perceive might tend to the augmentation of the glory of God and the true knowledge of his word. His said Majesty was of such sincere meaning in the advancing [hereof] as his Grace would neither headily. without good advisement, and consultation, and conference with his friends, go in any part beyond the said truth, no for any respect tarry or stay on this side the truth, but would proceed in the right straight mean way assuredly agreed upon. He had known of certainty divers who by their immederate zeal or the

September He has beard that the Luthernes granguic inetning to Rome and In desires to Rmow their true inten-and sacramentarians were guilty; so by secret report he had been advertised, that upon private communications and conferences, the learned men there [in Germany] had in certain points and articles yielded and releated from their first asseveration; by reason whereof it was much doubted whether by other degrees they might be disaua led in some of the rest. The King's Highness therefore, being very desirous to know the truth therein, and to be ascertained in what points and articles the barned men there were so assuredly and constantly excessive appetite to novelties had from darkness proceeded to much more darkness, wherein the Anabaptists

resolved as by no persuasion of man they could be turned from the same, had sent the Bishop of Hereford to the said duke, desiring and praying him in respect of the premises to entertain the said bishop friendly and familiarly concerning the matter aforesaid, as the mutual love carnally, and the zeal of both princes to the increase of the glory of God spiritually, did require." 1

The bishop was then to speak of the council, the assembling of which he understood that the Hadlimater to dissuade them from pressing it, to the extent of his ability. They would find themselves opposed inevitably in all essential matters by the pope, the emperor, and the French king, whose factions united would outnumber and outvote them; and in the existing state of Enrope, a general council would only compromise their position and embarrass their movements. however, netwithstanding his remonstrances, But I'a. the princes persisted in their wish, then the ment, let bishop was to urge them to come to some understanding with England on the resolutions understanting with which they desired to maintain. Let them England. communicate to the English bishops such points " as they would stick to without relenting;" and the two countries, "standing together, would be so much stronger to withstand their adversaries." Without definitely promising to sign the Confession of Augsburg, Henry held out strong hopes that he might sign that Confession, if they would send representatives to London to discuss the articles of it with nimself.2 The bishop was

¹ Instructions to the Bishop of Hereford: Rolls House MS.

In case they shall require that the King's Majesty shall receive the whole confession of Germany as it is imprinten, the bushop shall say that when the King's Highness shall have even and perused the articles of the to apologize for any previous slackness on the king's part in his communications with the elector, and The bishop was to apoleto express his hopes, that for the future their gion for all past coolrelations might be those of cordial unanimity. He was especially to warn the elector to beware of readmitting the papal supremacy under any pretext. The English had shaken off the pope, "provoked thereanto in such wise as would have proviked them. rather to have expelled him from them by wrong, than to suffer him so to oppress them with injuries." If in And to con- Germany they " opened the great gate " to atade with let him in again, he would rebuild " the forfresh warmings against the popu tresses that were thrown down, and by little and little bring all to the former estate again." Finally, with respect to the council - if a council there was to be - they must take care that it was held in a place indifferent, where truth might be heard or spoken; " considering that else in a council, were not the remedy that all good men sought, but the mischief that all good men did abhor."

These advances, consented to by Henry, were the act of Cromwell, and were designed as the commencement of a Foedus Evangelseum—a league of the great Reforming nations of Europe. It was a grand scheme, and history can never cease to regret that it was grasped at with too faint a hand. The bishop succeeded in neutralizing partially the scheming of the French, partially in attracting the sympathies of the league, and shall perceive that there is in it contained none other articles out such as may be agreeable with the Gospel, and such as his Highwase ought and conveniently may resintain, it is not to be doubted, and also,

I durat holdly aftern," the said bishop shall say, " that the King's Highteen will enter the same [league]." But it shall be necessary for the said duke and the princes confederate to send to the King's Highness such persenages as might devise, conclude, and condescend in every article. — Instructions to the Bishop of Hereford's Rolls House VII German powers towards England; but the two great streams of the Teutonic race, though separated by but a narrow ridge of difference, were unable to reach a common channel. Their genius drove them into courses which were to run side by side for centuries, yet ever to remain divided. And if the lines in which their minds have flowed seem to be converging at last, and if hereafter Germans and English are again to unite in a single faith, the remote meeting point is still invisible, and the terms of possible agreement can be but faintly conjectured.

CHAPTER X.

THE VISITATION OF THE MONASTREES.

Many high interests in England had been injured by the papal jurisdiction; but none had suffered more vitally than those of the monastic establishments. These establishments had been injured, not by fines and exactions, - for oppression of this kind had been terminated by the statutes of provisors, — but because, except at rare and remote intervals, they had been left to thomselves, without interference and without sur-They were deprived of those salutary checks which all human institutions require if they are to be saved from sliding into corruption. The of the rereligious houses, almost without exception, ligious houses from were not amenable to the authority of the The several societies acknowledged obedience only to the heads of their order, who resided abroad; or to the pope, or to some papal delegate. Thus any regularly conducted visitation was all but impossible. The foreign superiors, who were forbidden by statute to receive for their services more than certain limited and reasonable fees, would not undertake a gratuitous labour; and the visitations, attempted with imperfect powers 1 by the English archbishops, could be resisted successfully under pleas of exemption and obedience to the rules of the orders. Thus the abbeys had gone their own way, careless of the gathering indignation with which they were regarded by the people, and believing that in their position they held a sacred shield which would protect them for ever. In them, Contract in the mount as throughout the Catholic system, the sad- teries beness of the condition into which they had souther fallen was enhanced by the contrast between the theory and the degenerate reality. Originally, and for many hundred years after their founds- The original tion, the regular clergy were the finest body intention. of men of which mankind in their chequered history can boast. They lived to illustrate, in systematic simplicity, the universal law of sacrifice. In their three chief vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, they surrendered everything which makes life delightful. Their business on earth was to labour and to pray: to labour for other men's bodies, to pray for other men's touls. Wealth flowed in upon them; the world, in its instanctive loyalty to greatness, laid its lands and its possessions at their feet; and for a time was seen the notable spectacle of property administered as a trust, from which the owners resped no benefit, except increase of toil. The genius of the age expended its highest efforts to provide fitting tabernacles for the divine spirit which they enshrined; and alike in village and city, the majestic houses of the Father of mankind and his especial servants towered up in sovereign beauty, symbols of the civil supremacy of the church, and of the moral sublimity of life and character which had won the homage and the admiration of the Christian nations. Ever at the sacred gates sate Morcy, pouring out relief from a never-failing store to the poor and the suffering; ever within the sacred aisles the voices of holy men were pealing heavenwards, in intercession for the sins of mankind; and influences so blessed were thought to exhale around those mysterious precincts, that the outcasts of society — the debtor, the felon, and the outlaw - gathered round the walk, as the sick men sought the shadow of the apostle, and lay there sheltered from the avenging hand till their tins were washed from off their souls. Through the storms of war and conquest the abbeys of the middle ages floated, like the ark upon the waves of the flood, inviolate in the midst of violence, through the awful reverence which surrounded them.

^{*} The Boglish archbishops were embarrassed by the statutes of provisors in applying for plenary powers to Rome. If they accepted commissions they accepted them at their paril, and were compelled to caution in their manner of preceding.

I 97 Hen. VIII. cap. 98. The statute rays that many visitations had been made in the two hundred years preceding the Reformation, but had belief wholly of success.

The soul of "religion," I however, had died out of it for many generations before the Reforma-The life of it for many generations before the Reformareligion is tion. At the close of the fourteenth century, lith on-Wycliffe had cried that the rotting trunk cumbered the ground, and should be cut down. It had not been cut down: it had been allowed to stand for a hundred and fifty more years; and now it was mdeed plain that it could remain no longer. The boughs were bare, the stem was withered, the veins were choked with corruption; the ancient life-tree of monasticism would blossom and bear fruit no mora. Faith had sunk into superstition; duty had died into toutine; and the monks, whose technical discipline was forgotten, and who were set free by their position from the discipline of ordinary duty, had travelled swiftly on the downhill road of human corruption.

I To enter "religion" was the technical expressors for taking the Only light reference will be made in this place to the darker scandals by which the abbeys were The darker dishonoured. Such things there really wore, to be touched to an extent which it may be painful to be- "I'm. lieve, but which evidence too abundantly proves. It is better, however, to bury the recollection of the more odious forms of human depravity; and so soon as those who condemn the Reformation have ceased to deny what the painfulness of the subject only has allowed to remain disputed, the sins of the last English monks will sleep with them in their tombs. Here, in spite of such denials, the most offensive pictures shall continue to be left in the shade; and persons who wish to gratify their curiosity, or satisfy their unbelief, may consult the authorities for themselves. I Political and shall confine my own efforts rather to the weaken explanation of the practical, and, in the highest sense of the word, political abuses, which, on the whole, perhaps, told most weightily on the serious judgment of the age.

The abbeys, then, as the State regarded them, existed for the benefit of the poor. The occurate pants for the time being were themselves intended for the benefit of the benefit of the benefit of the benefit of the poor.

priate to their personal use no portion of the revenues of their estates; they were to labour with their own hands, and administer their property for the public advantage. The surplus proceeds of the lands, when

I A minimize of the condition of the Religious House, in the Cotton Library, Cleopatra, E 4; MB. Letters of the Visitors, in the same collection; three volumes of the correspondence of Richard Layton with Cromwell, in the State Paper Office, and the reports of the Visitations of 148r and 1511, in the Registers of Archbishops Biorton and Warbam. For printed authorities, see Suppression of the Monasteries, published by the Cambion Society; Strype's Monariels, Vol. 1, Appendix; Faller's Borlogication History; and Wilkian's Conciles, Vol. 111.

their own modest requirements had been supplied were to be devoted to the maintenance of learning. to the exercise of a liberal hospitality, and to the relief of the aged, the impotent, and the helpless. The pos-Proposition ular clamour of the day declared that these duties were systematically neglected; that two-thirds, at least, of the religious bodies abused heir opportunities unfairly for their own advantage; and this at a time when the obligations of all property were defined as strictly as its rights, and negligent lay owners were promptly corrected by the State whenever occasion required. The monks, it was believed, lived in idleness, keeping vast retinues of servants to do the work which they ought to have done them-Blogs dyle selves. They were accused of sharing diviamorphone, dends by mutual connivance, although they were forbidden by their rule to possess any private property whatever, and of wandering about the country in the disguise of laymen in pursuit of forbidden indulgences.3 They were bound by their statutes to keep their houses full, and if their means were enlarged, to increase their numbers; they were supposed to have allowed their complement to fall to half, and sometimes to a third, of the original foundation, fraudidently reserving the enlarged profits to themselves. Amounted It was thought, too, that they had racked the lands their estates; that having a life-interest only, ney had encumbered them with debts, mortgages, nd fines; that in some cases they had wholly aliented lands, of which they had less right to dispose

1 At Towkesbury, where there was an abbot and thirty-two monks. I had payment made to a hundred and feety-four nervants in Every, who were wholly engaged in the service of the abboy. — Particulars relating to the Dissolution of the Monasteries, section 5: Burnst's Collectence, p. 56.

5 See the Directions to the Visitors: Burnet's Collectence, p. 74.

Google

PENN " "

than a modern rector of his glebe. In the meantime, it was said that the poor were not fed, that the buildings hospitality was neglected, that the buildings hospitality and houses were falling to waste, that from the highest to the lowest, that the abbots sold the presentations to the benefices which were in their gift, or dishonestly retained the cures of souls in their own hands, careless whether the duties of the parishes could or could not be discharged; and that, finally, the wast majority of the monks themselves were ignorant, self-indulgent, profligate, worthless, dissolute.

These, in addition to the heavier accusations, were the charges which the popular voice had for more than a century brought against the monasteries, which had led Wycliffa to denounce their existence as intolerable, the House of Commons to petition Henry IV, for the secularization of their property, and Henry V. to appease the outery, by the suppression of more Absolut than a hundred, as an ineffectual warning to home was the rest.^a At length, in the year 1489, at the instigation of Cardinal Morton, then Archbishop of Canterbury, a commission was issued by Innocent VIII. for a general investigation throughout England mto the behaviour of the regular clergy. The pope said that he had heard, from persons worthy of credit, that abbots and monks in many places were systematically faithless to their vows; he conferred on the archbishop a special power of visitation, and visitation of directed him to admonish, to correct, to pun-

WOL. II. 5

Bes, the metance, Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 25.

[&]quot; In a parliament held at Leicester, in 1414, the priories alien in England were given to the king, all their possessions to remain to the ging and to his heirs for ever. And those priories were suppressed, to the number of more than a hundred houses." — Store's Chrosole, p. 348.

inh, as might seem to him to be desirable. On the receipt of these instructions, Morton addressed the following letter to the superior of an abbey within a few miles of London, - a peer of the realm, living in the full glare of notoriety, - a person whose offences, such as they were, had been committed openly, palpably, and conspicuously in the face of the world: -

"John, by Divine permission, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, Legate of Archbishop terbury, Primate of all England, Legate of the Abboy of the Apostolic See, to William, Abbot of the Monastery of St. Albert's greating Monastery of St. Alban's, greeting.

"We have received certain letters under lead, the copies whereof we herewith send you, from our most holy Lord and Father in Christ, Innocent, by Divine Providence Pope, the eighth of that name. We therefore, John, the archbishop, the visitor, reformer, inquisitor, and judge therein mentioned, in reverence for the Apostolic See, have taken upon ourselves the burden of enforcing the said commission; and have determined that we will proceed by, and according to, the full force, tenour, and effect of the same.

"And it has come to our ears, being at once publicly notorious and brought before us upon the testimony of many witnesses worthy of credit, that you, the abbot aforementioned, have been of long time noted and diffamed, and do yet continue so noted, of Simony, of usury, of dilapidation and waste of the goods, revenues, and possessions of the said monastery, and of certain other enormous crimes and excesses bereafter In the rule, custody, and administration of the goods, spiritual and temporal, of the said monastery, you are so remiss, so negligent, so prodigal, that whereas the said monastery was of old times founded and endowed by the pious devotion of illustrious princes of famous memory, heretofore kings of this land, the most noble progenitors of our most serene Lord and King that now is, in order that true religion might flourish there, that the name of the Most High, in whose honour and glory it was instituted, might be duly celebrated there;

The commission is in Morton a Register, MS., Lambeth Library.

"And whereas, in days heretofore the regular observance of the said rule was greatly regarded, and hospitality was diligently kept;

"Nevertheless, for no little time, during which you have presided in the same monastery, you and Delinguenelin certain of your fellow monks and brethren and the (whose blood, it is feared, through your neglect, a severe Judge will require at your hand) have relaxed the measure and form of religious life; you bave laid aside the pleasant yoke of contemplation, and all regular observances; hospitality, alms, and those other offices of piety which of old time were exercised and ministered therein have decreased, and by your faults. your carelessness, your neglect and deed, do daily decrease more and more, and cease to be regarded the pious vows of the founders are defrauded of their just intent; the antient rule of your order is deserted; and not a few of your fellow monks and brethren, as we most deeply grieve to learn, giving themselves over to a reprobate mind, laying aside the fear of God, do lead only a life of lasciviousness — nay, as is horrible to relate, be not afraid to defile the hely places, even the very churches of God, by infamous intercourse with BURL.

"You yourself, moreover, among other grave enormities and abominable crimes whereof you are guilty, and for which you are noted and diffamed, have, in the first place, admitted a certain married woman, named Elena Germyn, who has separated herself without just cause from her husband, and for some time past has lived in adultery with another man, to be a nun or sister in the house or Priory of Bray, lying, as you pretend, within your jurisdiction. You have next appointed the same woman to be prioress of the said house, notwithstanding that her said husband was hving at the time, and is still alive. And finally, Father Thomas Sudbury, one of your brother monks, publicly, notoriously, and without interference or punishment from you, has associated, and still associates, with this woman as an adulterer with his harlot.

"Moreover, divers other of your brethren and fellow monks have resorted, and do resort, continually to her and other women at the same place, as to a public brothel or receiving house, and have received no correction therefor.

" Nor is Bray the only house into which you have introduced disorder. At the nunnery of Sapwell, which you also contend to be under your jurisdiction, you change the prioresses and superiors again and again at your own will and caprice. Here, as well as at Bray, you depose those who are good and religious; you promote to the highest dignities the worthless and the vicious. The duties of the order are cast aside; virtue is neglected; and by these means so much cost and extravagance has been caused, that to provide means for your indulgence you have introduced certain of your brethren to preside in their houses under the name of guardians, when in fact they are no guardians, but thieves and notorious villains; and with their help you have caused and permitted the goods of the same priories to be dispensed, or to speak more truly to be dissipated, in the above described corruptions and other enormous and accursed offences. Those places once religious are rendered and reputed as it were profane and impious; and by your own and your creatures' conduct are so impoverished as to be reduced to the verge of run.

"In like manner, also, you have dealt with certain other cells of monks, which you say are subject to you, even within the monastery of the glorious proto-martyr, Alban himself. You have dilapidated the common property; you have made away with the jewels; the copses, the woods, the underwood, almost all the oaks and other forest trees, to the value of eight thousand marks and more, you have made to be cut down without distinction, and they have by you been sold and The brethren of the abbey, some of whom, as is reported, are given over to all the evil things of the world, neglect the service of God altogether. They -live with harlots and mistresses publicly and continuously, within the precincts of the monastery and with-Some of them, who are covetous of honour and promotion, and desirous therefore of pleasing your cupidity, have stolen and made away with the chalices and other jewels of the church. They have even sacrilegiously extracted the precious stones from the very shrine of St. Alban; and you have not punished these men, but have rather knowingly supported and maintained them. If any of your brethren be living justly and religiously, if any be wise and virtuous, these you straightway depress and hold in hatred. You "

But this overwhelming document need not be transcribed further. It pursues its way through mire and filth to its most lame and impotent conclusion. The abbut was not deposed; he was invited merely to reconsider his conduct, and, if possible, amend it.

Offences similar in kind and scarcely less grosz were exposed at Waltham, at St. Andrew's, Northampton, at Calais, and at other places. Again, a reprimand was considered to be an adequate punishment.

Evils so deep and so abominable would not yield to languid treatment; the visitation had been feeblo in its execution and limited in extent. In 1511 a second was attempted by Archbishop Warham.4 Vigitation of Archbahop Warham in Mill. This inquiry was more partial than the first, yet similar practices were brought to light: women introduced to religious houses; nuns and abbesses accusing one another of incontinency; the alms collected in the chapels squandered by the monks in Once more, no cure was attempted licentiousness. beyond a paternal admonition.* A third effort was made by Wolsey twelve years later: again exposure followed, and again no remedy was found.

If the condition of the abbeys had appeared intolerable before investigation, still less could it be endured when the justice of the accusations against them had been ascertained. But the church was unequal to the work of self-reformation. Parliament alone could decide on the measures which the emergency made necessary; and preparatory to legislation, the frue circumstances and present character of the religious bedies throughout the whole country were to be ascertained accurately and completely.

Accordingly, in the summer of 1585, directly after

Merton's Register, MS., Lambeth.
 Warhana's Register, MS., Lambeth.

Dad.

Sir Thomas More's execution, Cromwell, now "vicegerent of the king in all his ecclesiastical Improof s jurisdiction within the realm," I issued a commission for a general visitation of the religious visitation. houses, the universities, and other spiritual corporations. The persons appointed to conduct the inquiry were Doctors Legh, Leyton, and Ap Rice, ecclesiastical lawyers in holy orders, with various subordinates Legh and Leyton, the two principal commis- Chancer of sioners, were young, impetuous men, likely shows to execute their work rather thoroughly than delicately; but, to judge by the surviving evidence, they were as upright and plain-dealing as they were assuredly able and efficient. It is pretended by some writers that the inquiry was set on foot with a preconceived purpose of spoliation; that the duty of the visitors was rather to defame roundly than to report truly; and that the object of the commission was merely to justify an act of appropriation which had been already determined. The commission of Pope Innocent, with the previous inquiries, puts to silence so gratuitous a supposition; while it is certain that antecedent to the presentation of the report, an extensive measure of suppression was not so much as contemplated. The table The directions to the visitors, the injunctions the cover to coto the which they were to carry with them to the to destroy. various houses, the private letters to the superiors, which were written by the king and by Cromwell," show plainly that the first object was to reform and not to destroy; and it was only when reformation was found to be conclusively hopeless, that the harder alternative was resolved upon. The report itself is no longer extant. Bonner was directed by Queen Mary to destroy all discoverable copies of it, and his work was fatally well executed. We are able, however, to replace its contents to some extent, out of the despatches of the commissioners.

¹ See Injunctions to the Clergy: Paxe, Vol. V. p. 135.

Barnet's Collectonia, p. 74.

Strype's Bedesiastical Memorials, Vol. I., Appendix, p. 214.

Their discretionary powers were unusually large, as The commiss appears from the first act with which the a labilition visitors commenced operations. On their own responsibility, they issued an inhibition against the bishops, forbidding them to exercise any portion of their jurisdiction while the visitation was in progress. The sees themselves were to be inspected; and they desired to make the ground clear before they moved. When the amazed bishops exclaimed against so unheard of an innovation, Doctor Legh justified the order by saying, that it was well to compel the prelates to know and feel their new position; and in the fact of their suspension by a royal commission, to "agnize" the king as the source of episcopal authority.1

and some sent in their answer to the complaints of the House of Commons. The visitors, in this haughty style, having established their powers, began work with the university of Oxford. Their time was short, for parliament was to meet early in the spring, when their report was to be submitted to it; and their business meanwhile was not only to observe and inquire, but any reforms which were plainly useful and good, they were themselves to execute. They had no time for hesitation, therefore,

Logh to Cromwell, Sept. 24th: Strype's Reclasinstical Memorials, Vol.
 Appendix, p. 216. — Otton. M.S. Cleopatra, E 4, 50l. 225

and they laid their hands to the task before them with a promptitude at which we can only wonder. The heads of houses, as may be supposed, saw little around then, which was in need of reform. A few condition of students of high genius and high purposes sohad been introduced into the university, as we have seen, by Wolsey; and these had been assiduously exiled or imprisoned. All suspected books had been hunted out. There had been fagot processions in High-street, and bonfires of New Testaments store of the at Carfax. The daily chapels, we suppose, bound had gone forward as usual, and the drowsy lectures on the Schoolmen; while "towardly young men" who were venturing stealthily into the perilons heresy of Greek, were eyed askance by the authorities, and taught to tremble at their temerity. All this we might have looked for; and among the authorities themselves, also, the world went forward in a very natural manner. There was comfortable live Furnished the ing in the colleges; so comfortable, that many of the day presents of the country clergy preferred Oxford and of study Cambridge to the monotony of their parishes, and took advantage of a clause in a late act of parliament, which recognised a residence at either of the universities as an excuse for absence from tedious duties. and many persons," it was found, "beneficed with cure of souls, and being not apt to study by reason of their age or otherwise, no never intending before the making of the said act to travel in study, but rather minding their own ease and pleasure, colourably to defraud the same good statute, did daily and commonly resort to the and universities, where, under pretence of study, they continued and abode, living dissolutely; nothing profiting themselves in learning, but consumed the time in idleness and pastimes and insolent pleasures, giving occasion and evil example thereby to the young men and students within the universities, and occupying such rooms and commodities as were instituted for the maintenance and relief of poor scholars." I These persons were not driven away by the heads of houses so the Christian Brothers had been; they were welcomed rather as pleasant companions. In comfortable conservatism they had no tendencies to heresy, but only to a reasonable indulgence of their five bodily censes. Doubtless, therefore, the visitors found Oxford pleasant place, and cruelly they marred the enjoyments of it. Like a sudden storm of rain, they dropt The charge-down into its quiet precincts. Headless of rights of fellows and founders' bequests, of sleepy dignities and established indolences, they reestablished long dormant lectures in the colleges. a few little days (for so long only they remained) they poured new life into education. They founded fresh professorships — professorships of Polite Latin, professorships of Philosophy, Divinity, Canon Law, Natural Sciences - above all of the dreaded Greek; confiscating funds to support them. For the old threadbare text-books, some real teaching was swiftly substituted. The idle residents were noted down, soon to be sent home by parliament to their benefices, under pain of being compelled, like all other students, to attend lectures, and, in their proper persons, "keep sophisms, problems, disputations, and all other exercises of learning." 3

The discipline was not neglected: "we have enjoined the religious students," Leyton wrote to Crom-

^{5 26} Hen. VIII. cap. 13.

That is, the exhibitioners sent up to the university from the monasteries.

well, "that none of them, for no manner of cause, shall come within any tavern, inn, or alchouse, or Berototton any other house, whatsoever it be, within the of discipline town and subarbs. [Each offender] once so taken, to be sent home to his cloyster. Without doubt, this act is greatly lamented of all honest women of the town; and especially of their laundresses, that may not now once enter within the gates, much less within the chambers, whereunto they were right well accustomed. I doubt not, but for this thing, only the honest matrons will sue to you for redress." These were sharp measures; we lose our breath at their rapidity and violence. The saddest vicissitude was that which befell the famous Duns — Duns Scotus, Newsorth fits of Buns the greatest of the Schoolmen, the construct- boxus. or of the memoria technica of ignorance, the ancient text-book of a priori knowledge, established for centuries the supreme despot in the Oxford lecture-rooms. "We have set Duns in Bocardo," says Leyton. was thrown down from his high estate, and from being lord of the Oxford intellect, was "made the common servant of all men; " condemned by official sentence to the lowest degradation to which book can be submitted.2 Some copies escaped this worst fate; but for changed uses thenceforward. The second occasion on which the visitors came to New College, they "found the great Quadrant Court full of the leaves of Duns, the wind blowing them into every corner; and one Mr. Greenfield, a gentleman of Buckinghamshire, gathering up part of the same book leaves, as he said, to make him sewers or blawnsheres, to keep the deer within his wood, thereby to have the better cry with his hounds." 1

2 Ed qued meis sculis vids, l'eyton writes: Pois.

Strype, Monoracle, Vol. 1. p. $98. Leyton to Cronwell Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 71, at seq.

To such base uses all things return at last; dust unto dust, when the life has died out of them, and the living world needs their companionship no longer.

On leaving Oxford, the visitors apread over England, north, south, east, and west. We trace Legh in rapid progress through Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Lincoln, Yorkshire, and Northumberland; Leyton through Middlesex, Kent, Sussex, Hants, Somersetshire, and Devon. They appeared at monastery after monastery, with prompt, decisive questions; and if the truth was concealed, with expedients for discovering it, in which practice soon made them skilful. All but everywhere the result was the July regits same. At intervals a light breaks through, and symptoms appear of some efforts after decency; but in the vast majority of the smaller houses, the previous results were repeated, the popular enspicions were more than confirmed. Wolsey, when writing to the pope of his intended reformation, had spoken of the animus The entered improbus, and the frightful symptoms which existed of it. He was accused, in his attempted impeachment, of having defamed the character of the English clergy. Yet Wolsey had written no more than the truth, as was too plainly discovered. I lo not know what to say on this matter, or what to leave unsaid. If I am to relate the suppression of the monasteries, I should relate also why they were suppressed. If I were to tell the truth, I should have first to warn all modest eyes to close the book, and read no further. It will perhaps be sufficient if I introduce a few superficial stories, suggestive rather than illustrative of the dark matter which remains in the shade.

¹ Leyton to Cromwell: Suppression of the Monuteries, p. 71, et sen.

I have spoken more than once of the monastery of Sion. It was the scene of the Nun of Kent's Ston Monay intrigues. It furnished more than one martyr for the Catholic cause ; and the order was Carthusian -one of the strictest in England. There were two houses attached to the same establishment — one of monks, another of nuns. The confessors of the women were chosen from the friars, and they were found to have abused their opportunities in the most infamous manner. With a hateful mixture of sensuality and superstition, the offence and the absolution went handin-hand. One of these confessors, so zealous The confes for the pope that he professed himself ready the fruits of to die for the Roman cause, was in the habit ". of using language so filthy to his penitents, that it was necessary to "sequester him from hearing ladies" confessions." The nuns petitioned the visitors, on the exposure of the seduction of a sister, that he and his companion might come to them no more; and the friar was told that his abominable conduct might be the occasion that "skrift should be laid down in England."

This is one instance of an evil found fatally prevalent.

Again, the clergy were suspected of obtaining dispensations from their superiors indulging research them in a breach of their vows. The laxity produces of the church courts in dealing with clerical delinquents had perhaps given rise to this belief; but the Legism to Cromwell: Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 48. Let it not be thought that the papel party were worse than the other. The sector confessor, if anything the more profligate of the two, gave his services to the king.

Bralley, in Wiltshire. The prior of this house had a famly of illegitimate children, whom he brought up and provided for in a very comfortable manner; 1 and the visitor wrote that "the pope, considering his fragility." had granted him a licence in this little matter; that he had, in fact, "a good writing sub plumbo, to discharge his conscience." I do not easily believe that authentic dispensations of such a kind were obtained from Rome, or were obtainable from it; but of forged dispensations, invented by reverend offenders or fraudalently issued by the local ecclesiastical authorities, to keep appearances smooth, there were probably enough, and too many."

The more ordinary experiences of the commissioners may be described by Leyton himself, in an league Ab account which he wrote of his visit to Langden Abbey, near Dover. The style is graphic, and the picture of the scene one of the most complete which remains. The letter is to Cromwell.

"Please it your goodness to understand that on Friday, the 22ud of October, I rode back with speed to take an inventory of Folkstone, and from thence I went to Langden. Whereat immediately descending from my horse, I sent Bartlett, your servant, with all my servants, to circumspect the abbey, and surely to keep all back-doors and starting-holes. I myself went

¹ The prior is an holy man, and hath but six children; and but one Laughter married yet of the goods of the monastery. His sous to tall man, waiting upon him. — Layton to Cremwell: Suppression of the Monasterian, p. III

I leave this passage as it stands. The acquittal of the papal courts of actual complicity becomes, however, increasingly difficult to me. I dissevered among the MSS, in the Rella House a list of eighteen clergy and hymen in one discesse who had, or professed to have dispensations to keep somewhere. — Note to Second Edition.

alone to the abbot's lodging, joining upon the fields and wood, even like a cony clapper, full of starting-holes. [I was] a good space knocking at the abbot's door; nee pox nec sensus apparait, saving the abbot's little dog that within his door fast locked bayed and barked. I found a short poleaxe standing behind the door, and with it I dashed the abbot's door in pieces, ictu oculi, and set one of my men to keep that door; and about the house I go, with that poleaxe in my hand, ne forte, for the abbot is a dangerous desperate knave, and a hardy. But for a conclusion, his gentle woman besturred her stumps towards her starting-holes; and then Bartlett, watching the pursuit, took the tender damoisel; and, after I had examined her, [brought her] to Dover to the mayor, to set her in some cage or prison for eight days; and I brought holy father abbot to Canterbury, and here in Christchurch I will leave him in prison. In this sudden doing az tempore, to circumspect the house, and to search, your servant John Antony's men marvelled what fellow I was, and so did the rest of the abbey, for I was unknown there of all men. I found her apparel in the abbot's coffer. To tell you all this comedy (but for the abbot a tragedy), it were too Now it shall appear to gentlemen of this country, and other the commone, that ye shall not deprive or visit, but upon substantial grounds. The rest of all this knavery I shall defer till my coming unto you, which shall be with as much speed as I can possible." 1

Towards the close of the year, Leyton went north to join Legh; and together they visited a nun- October. Remark of nery at Lichfield. The religious orders were seemed. bound by oaths similar to those which have recently created difficulty in Oxford. They were sworn to divulge nothing which might prejudice the interests of The superior at Lichfield availed herself the houses. of this plea. When questioned as to the state of the convent, she and the sisterhood refused to allow that there was any disorder, or any irregularity, which could give occasion for inquiry. Her assertions were not implicitly credited; the inspection proceeded, and at length two of the sisters were discovered ala terbood to be "not barren"; a priest in one instanco having been the occasion of the misfortune, and a serving-man in the other. No confession could be obtained either from the offenders themselves, or from the society. The secret was betrayed by an "old beldame"; "and when," says Leyton, "I objected against the prioresses, that if they could not show me a cause reasonable of their concealment, I must needs, and would, punish them for their manifest perjury, — their answer was, that they were bound by their religion never to confess the secret faults done amongst them, but only to a visitor of their own religion, and to that they were sworn, every one of them, on their first admission." 1

¹ Levton to Cromwell: Suppression of the Monasteries, pp. 75, 76

A little later the commissioners were at Fountains Abbey; and tourists, who in their day-dreams among those fair ruins are inclined to complain of the sacrilege which wasted the houses of prayer, may study with advantage the following account of that house in the year which preceded its dissolution. The outward beautiful ruin was but the symbol and consequence of a moral ruin not so beautiful. "The Abbot of Fountains," we read in a joint letter of Legh and Leyton, had "greatly disapidated his house, [and] wasted the woods, notoriously keeping mix women. [He is] defamed here," they say, "a total populo, one day denying these articles, with many more, the next day confessing the same, thus manifestly incurring perjury." Six days before the visitors' access to his monastery " he committed theft Thes and and sacrilege, confessing the same. At mid- accounties night he caused his chaplain to seize the sex- by the about ton's keys, and took out a jewel, a cross of gold with stones. One Warren, a goldsmith in the Chepe, was with him in his chamber at that hour, and there they stole out a great emerald, with a ruby. The said Warren made the abbot believe the ruby to be but a garnet, so that for this he paid nothing. For the emerald he paid but twenty pounds. He sold hun also the plate without weight or ounces; how much the abbot was deceived therein he cannot tell, for he is a very fool and miserable idiot." 1

¹ Leyton to Cromwell: Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 11.

Under an impression that frauds of this description were becoming frequent, the government had instructed the commissioners to take inventories of the plate and jewels; and where they property and to bring away way the structed of the property and to bring away way the structed of the property and to bring away whatever seemed superfluous, after leaving a pass.

supply sufficient for the services of the house and chapel. The misdemeanour of the Abhot of Fountains was not the only justification of these directions. Sometimes the plate was secreted. The reserves about the Prior of Christ Church, Canterbury, was about accused of having sent in a false return, keeping back gold and precious stones valued at a thousand pounds. Information was given by some of the breth-

YOU IL

Loyton and Logh to Cromwell: Bupywarden of he Monasterias, p. 100.
 Christopher Levyns to Cromwell: Ibid. p. 90. Not in this instance !
 tenht the truth of the charge.

ren, who professed to fear that the prior would poison them in revenge.

Occasionally the monks ventured on rougher methods to defend themselves. Here is a small spark of English life while the investigation was in progress, Somest Nor- I glitted by a stray letter from an English ten Abbey.
gentleman of Cheshire. The lord chancellor was informed by Sir Piers Dutton, justice of the peace that the visitors had been at Norton Abbey. They had concluded their inspection, had packed up such jewels and plate as they purposed to remove, and were going away, when, the day being late and the weather foul, they changed their minds, and resolved to spend the night where they were. In the evening, "the abbot," says Sir Piers, "gathered together a great company, to the number of two or three hundred persons, so that the commissioners were in fear of their lives, and were fain to take a tower there; and therefrom sent a letter unto me, ascertaining me what danger they were in, and desiring me to come and essist them, or they were never likely to come thence. Which letter came to me about nine of the clock, and about two o'clock on the same night I came thither with such of my tenants as I had near about me, and found divers fires made, as well within the gates as without and the said about had caused an ox to be killed, with other victuals, and prepared for such of his company as he had there. I used some policy, and came suddenly upon them. Some of them took to the pools and water, and it was so dark that I could not find them. Howbeit I took the abbot and three of his canons, and brought them to the king's castle of Hatton." 1

I for Piere Dutton to the Lord Chanceller: Ellie, third series, Vol. III. p. 49

If, however, the appropriation of the jewels led to occasional resistance, another duty which the commissioners were to discharge secured them as often a warm and eager welcome. It was believed that the monastic institutions had furnished an opportunity, in many quarters, for the disposal of inconvenient members of families. Children of both sexes, it was thought, had been forced into abbeys and convents at an age toc young to have allowed them a free choice in the the doors of their prison house were thrown under 21, and name open. On the day of visitation, when the their prison house were thrown under 21, and name open. brethren, or the sisterhood, were assembled, the visitors informed everywhere such monks as were under twenty-four, and such nuns as were under twenty-one, that they might go where they pleased. To those among them who preferred to return to the world, a secular dress was given, and forty shillings in money, and they were restored to the full privileges of the laity.

The opportunity so justly offered was passionately embraced. It was attended only with this misfortune, that the line was arbitrarily drawn, and many poor wretches who found themselves condemned by the accident of a few more days or months of life to perpetual imprisonment, made piteous entreaties for an extension of the terms of freedom. At Ford-Themselfs ham, in Cambridgeshire, Dr. Legh wrote to perform for Cromwell, "the religious persons kneeling on their knees, instantly with humble petition desire of God and the king and you, to be dismissed from their religion, saying they live in it contrary to God's law and their consciences; trusting that the king, of his gracious goodness, and you, will set them at liberty out of their bondage, which they are not able to endure, but should fall into desperation, or else run away." "It were a deed of charity," he continued, fresh from the scene where he had witnessed the full m'sery of their condition, "that they might live in that kind of living which might be most to the glory of God, the quietness of their consciences, and most to the commonwealth, whoseever hath informed you to the contrary." 1 Similar expressions of sympathy are frequent in the visitors' letters. Sometimes the poor monks sued directly to the vicar-general, and Cromwell must have received many petitions as strange, as helpless, and as graphic, as this which follows. The writer was a certain Brother Beerley, a Benedictine monk of Pershore, in Worcestershire. It is amusing to find him addressing the vicar-general as his "most reverend lord in God." I preserve the spelling, which, however, will with some difficulty be found intelligible.

"We do nothing seyrch," says this good brother, " for the doctryn of Chryst, but all fowlows Latter of a monk of owr owne sensyaly and plesure. Also most Persons to gracyus Lord, there is a secrett thynge in my conchons whych doth move mee to go owt of the relygyon, an yt were never so perfytt, whych no man may know but my gostly fader; the wych I supposs yf a man mothe guge [is] yn other yong persons as in me selfe. But Chryst save nolite judicare et non judicabizwini, therefore y wyll guge my nowne conschons fyrst -the wych fault ye shall know of me heyrafter more largyously -- and many other fowll vycys done amonckst rolygyus men - not relygyus men, as y thynck they owt not to be cald, but dyssemblars with God.

¹ Logh to Cromwell: Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 82. The last words are curious, as implying that Cromwell, who is always supposed to have urged upon the king the dissolution of the abbeys and the marriage with clergy, at this time inclined the other way.

"Now, most gracyus Lord and most worthys: vyeytar that ever cam amonckes us, help me owt of thys vayne relygyon, and macke me your servant handmayd and beydman, and save my sowlle, wych shold be lost yf ye helpe yt not — the wych ye may save wyth one word speking — and mayck me wych am nowe nawtt to cum unto grace and goodness.

"Now y wyll ynstrux your Grace sumwatt of relygyus men, and how the Kyng's Gracis commandment is keyp yn puttyng forth of bockys the Beyschatt of Rome's userpt pour. Monckes drynke an bowll after collatyon tyll ten or twelve of the clok, and cum to matyns as dronek as myss—and sum at cardys, sum at dycys, and at tabulles; sum cum to mattyns begenying at the mydes, and sum wen yt ys almost dun, and wold not cum there so only for boddly punyshment, nothyng for Goddis sayck. Also abbettes, monckes, prests, dun lyttyl or nothyng to put owtte of bockys
the Beyschatt of Rome's name—for y myself do know yn dyvers bockys where ys name ys, and hys userpt power upon us!."

In reply to these and similar evidences of the state of the monasteries, it will be easy to say, that in the best ages there were monks impatient of their vows, and abbots negligent of their duties; that human weakness and human wickedness may throw a stain over the noblest institutions; that nothing is proved by collecting instances which may be merely exceptions, and that no evidence is more fallacious than that which ests upon isolated facts.

It is true; and the difficulty is felt as keenly by the accuser who brings forward charges which it is discreditable to have urged, if they cannot be substantiated, as 1 Richard Bearley to Cromwell: Supermion of the Monasteries, p. 122.

by those who would avail themselves of the easy spening to evade the weight of the indictment. I have to say only, that if the extracts which I have made lead persons disposed to differ with me to examine the locuments which are extant upon the subject, they w'I learn what I have concealed as well as what I have alleged; and I believe that, if they begin the inquiry (as I began it myself) with believing that the religious orders had been over-hardly judged, they will close it with but one desire — that the subject shall never more be mentioned.

Leaving, then, the moral condition in which the vis-New regular itors found these houses, we will now turn to broad by the the regulations which they were directed to enforce for the future. When the investigation at each of the houses had been completed, when the young monks and nuns had been dismissed, the accounts audited, the property examined, and the necessary inquiries had been made into the manners and habits of the establishment, the remaining fraternity were then assembled in the chapter-house, and the commissioners delivered to them their closing directions. No differences were made between the orders. The same language was used everywhere. The statute of supremacy was first touched upon; and the injunction was repeated for the detailed observance of it. tain broad rules of moral obedience were then laid lown, to which all "religious" men without exception were expected to submit.1

No monks, thenceforward, were to leave the pretransmin circle of the monastery to which they beseed and longed, under any pretext; they were to confine themselves within the walls, to the house, the gardens, and the grounds.

³ These rules must be remembered. The impossibility of enfercing abelience to them was the cause of the ultimate resolution to break up the system.

Mark .

No women were to come within the walls, without licence from the king or the visitor; and, to prevent all unpermitted ingress or egress, private the vate doors and posterns were to be walled up.

There was, in future, to be but one entrance only, by the great foregate; and this was to be diligently watched by a porter. The "brethren" were to take their meals decently in the common hall together in the habit of doing, "for any certain, usual, or accustomed portion of meat;" but were to be content with what was set before them, giving thanks to God.

To ensure gravity and decency, one of the brethren, at every refection, was to read aloud a chapter of the Old or New Testament.

The abbot was " to keep an honest and hospitable table;" and an almoner was to be appointed in each house, to collect the broken means, and to distribute them among the deserving poor.

Special care was to be taken in this last article, and by no means should such alms be given to valued, mighty, and idle beggare and vagation bonds, such as commonly use to resort to such besupported places; which rather as drove beasts and mychers should be driven away and compelled to labour, than in their idleness and lewdness be cherished and maintained, to be great hindrance and damage of the commonweal."

All other alms and distributions, either prescribed oy the statutes of the foundations, or established by the customs of the abbeys, were to be made and given as largely as at any past time.

The abbots were to make no waste of the woods or

The same of the last lands. They were to keep 'neir accounts with an annual audit, faithfully and truly.

No fairs nor markets were any more to be be beld held within the precincts.

Every monk was to have a separate bed, and not to have any child or boy lying with him, or otherwise haunting unto him.

The "brethren" were to occupy themselves in daily reading or other honest and laudable exercises. Especially there was to be every day one general lesson in Holy Scripture, at which every member of the house was bound to be present.

Finally, that they might all understand the meaning of their position in the world, and the intention, which they had so miserably forgotton, of the foundations to which they belonged, the abbot, prior, or president, was every day to explain in English some portion of the rule which they had professed, the month have professed shall every day be read to them.

Was every day to explain in English some portion of the rule which they had professed, the applying the same always to the doctrine of Christ." The language of the injunctions is either Cromwell's or the king's; and the passage upon this subject is exceedingly beautiful.

The abbot shall teach them that the said rule, and other their principles of religion (so far as they be mudable), be taken out of Holy Scripture: and he shall show them the places from whence they be derived: and that their ceremonies and other observances be none other things than as the first letters or principles, and certain introductions to true Christianity: and that true religion is not contained in apparel, manner of going, shaven heads, and such other marks; nor in allence, fasting, uprising in the night, singing, and such other kind of ceremonies; but in cleanness of mind, pureness of living, Christ's faith not feigned, and brotherly charity, and true honouring of God in spirit and verity; and that those abovesaid things were instituted and begun, that they being first exercised in these, in process of time might ascend to those as by certain steps - that is to say, to the chief point and end of religion. And therefore, let them be exhorted that they do not continually stick and surcease in such ceremonies and observances, as though they had perfectly fulfilled the chief and outmost of the whole of true religion; but that when they have once passed such things, they should endeavour themselves after higher things, and convert their minds from such external matters to more inward and deeper considerations, as the law of God and Christian religion doth teach and shew: and that they assure not themselves of any reward or commodity by reason of such ceremonies and observances, except they refer all such to Christ, and for his sake observe them." 1

At one time fairs and markets were held in churchyards. -- Stat Wyelton, 19 Ed I. cap. 6.

Certainly, no government which intended to make the irregularities of an institution an excuse for destroying it, ever laboured more assiduously to defeat its own objects. Those who most warmly disapprove of the treatment of the monasteries have so far no reason to complain; and except in the one point of the papal supremacy, under which, be it remembered, the religious orders had luxuriated in corruption, Becket or Hildebrand would scarcely have done less or more than what had as yet been attempted by Henry.

But the time had now arrived when the results of the investigation were to be submitted to the nation. The parliament — the same old parliament of 1529, which had commenced the struggle with the bishops -was now meeting for its last session, to deal with this its greatest and concluding difficulty. It assembled on the 4th of February, and the preliminances 1586. of the great question being not yet completed, ments for its the Houses were first occupied with simplifying justice and abolishing the obsolete privileges of the Northern palatinates.¹ Other minor matters were also disposed of. Certain questionable people, who were taking advantage of the confusion of the times to "withhold tythes," were animadverted upon.2 The treason law was further extended to comprehend the forging of the king's sign-manual, signet, and privy weal, "divers light and evil-disposed persons having of late had the courage to commit such The scale of fees at the courts of law was fixed by statute; and felons having protection of sanctuary were no longer to be permitted to leave the precincts, and return at their pleasure. When they went abroad, they were to wear badges, declaring who and what they were; and they were to be within bounds after sunset. In these and similar regulations the The commb. early weeks of the session were consumed. At length the visitors had finished their work, and the famous Black Book of the monasterice was laid on the table of the House of Commons.

General Injunctions to be given on the King's Highness's behalf, in all Monasteries and other houses of whatsoever acces or religion they be Burnet's Collectorica, p. 77.

This book, I have said, unhappily no longer exists. Persons however who read it have left on record emphatic descriptions of its contents; and the preamble of the act of parliament of which it formed the foundation, dwells upon its character with much distinctness.

 I cannot liscuss the insoluble question whether the stories which it contained were true. History is ill occupied with discussing probabilities on a priori grounds, when the scale of likelihood is graduated by antecedent prejudice. It is enough that the report was drawn up by men who had the means of knowing the truth, and who were apparently under no temptation to misrepresent what they had seen; that the description coincides with the authentic letters of the vicitors; and that the account was generally accepted as true by the English parliament.

It appeared, then, on this authority, that two-thirds of the monks in England were living in Two thirds of the monks habits which may not be described. The are living in facts were related in great detail. The confessions of parties implicated were produced, aigned by their own hands. The vows were not observed. The lands were wasted, sold, and mortgaged. The foundations were incomplete. The houses were falling to waste; within and without, the monastic system was in ruins. In the smaller abbeys especially, where, from the limitation of numbers, the members were able to connive occurely at each other's misdemeanours, they were acturated with profligacy, with Simony, with drunkenness. The case against the monasteries was complete; and there is no occasion either to be surprised or peculiarly horrified at the discovery. The demoralization which was exposed was nothing less and nothing more than the condition into which men of average nature compelled to cellbacy, Strype's Memorials, Vol. L. p. 387; Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 114.

^{} When their enermities were first read in the parliament bouse, they were so great and abomianble that there was nothing but "Down with them!" -- Latinger's Bermons, p. 183.

and living as the exponents of a system which they lisbelieved, were certain to fall.

There were exceptions. In the great monasteries, er in many of them, there was decency and honourable nanagement; but when all the establishments, large and small, had been examined, a third only could claim to be exempted from the darkest schedule. This was the burden of the report which was submitted to the legislature. So long as the extent of the evil was unknown, it could be tolerated; when it had been exposed to the world, honour and justice alike required a stronger remedy than an archiepiscopal remonstrance. A "great debate" followed.1 The journals of the session are lost, and we cannot replace the various arguments; but there was not a member of either House who was not connected. either by personal interest, or by sacred associations, with one or other of the religious houses; there was not one whose own experience could not test in some degree the accuracy of the Black Book; and there was no disposition to trifle with institutions which were the cherished dependencies of the great English families.

The instincts of conservatism, association, sympathy, respect for ancient bequests, and a sense of the sacredness of property set apart for holy uses, and guarded by anathemas, all must have been against a dissolution; yet, so far as we can supply the loss of the journals from other accounts of the feeling of the time, there seems to have been neither hope nor desire of preserving the old system — of preserving the houses, that is, collectively under their existing statutes.

M foundations in themselves inviolate. The visitation

1 27 Hen. VIII cap. 28.

had been commenced with a hope that extremities might still be avoided. But all expectation of this kind vanished before the fatal evidence which had been produced. The House of Commons had for a century and a half been familiar with the thought of suppression as a possible necessity. The time was come when, if not suppression, yet some analogous measure had become imperative. The smaller establishments, at least, could not and might not continue. Yet while, so far, there was general agreement, it was no easy matter to resolve upon a satisfactory remedy. The representatives of the founders considered that, Conflicting interests.

If houses were suppressed which had been The representative of established out of estates which had belonged the foundary. to their forefathers, those estates should revert to the heirs, or at least, that the heirs should recover them upon moderate terms.1 In the Reforming party there was difference of opinion on the legality of biviolation as secularizing property which had been given to Reformers. God. Latimer, and partially Cromwell, inherited the designs of Wolsey; instead of taking away from the church the lands of the abbays, they were desirous of seeing those lands transferred to the high and true interests of religion. They wished to convert the houses into places of education, and to reform, wherever possible, the ecclesiastical bodies themselves.2 This, too, Meny letters from country gentlemen to this effect are in the collection made by Sir Heavy Ellis.

^{*} Latimer at first even objected to marke leaving their profession. Speaking of racking Scripture, he says, "I myself have been one of them that both tack," I have believed and expounded against religious persons that would formake their order, and would go out of their cloyster "— Sermons, y 50. We find him entreating Cromwell to prevent the suppression of Great Malvern, and begging that it may be allowed to remain,—
* Not in markery, but any other ways as should seem good to the King's Majesty, as to maintain teaching, preaching, Stidy, with praying and good proved.

was the dream, the "devout imagination," as it was called, of Knox, in Scotland, as it has been since the tatmer and dream of many other good men who have knor after not rightly understood why the moment at which the church was washed clean from its stains, and came out fresh robed in the wedding-garment of purity, should have been chosen to strip it of its resources, and depose it from power and preëminence. Cranmer, on the other hand, less Cranmer coposed to coimaginative but more practical, was reluctant derporations. that clerical corporations should be continued. under any under any pretext - even under the mild form of cathedral chapters. Cranmer desired to see the secular system of the church made as efficient as possible; the religious system, in its technical sense, he believed to have become a nursery of ideness, and believed that no measures of reform could restore the old tone to institutions which the world had outgrown.1 In the present age it will perhaps be considered that Cranmer's sagacity was more right than Lati-Cremmer mer's enthusiasm, however at the moment prove right then Latmer, as an men's warmer instincts might seem to have parlence bas housekeeping." — Suppression of the Monasteries, p. 149. Late in his life, under Edw 11] he alluded historily to the decay of education, and the misses of the appropriated abbey lands. — Sermons, p. 221.

tory both of the Scotch and English church permits the belief that neither would have been benefited by the possession of larger wealth than was left to them.

pleaded for the latter. The subsequent his-

4

[&]quot;Tale is my consideration; for having experience, both in times past and also in our days, how the sect of prebendaries have not only spent their time in much idleness, and their substance in superfluous bely cheer. I think it not to be a convenient state or degree to be maintained and established, considering that commonly a prebendary is neither a learning one teacher, but a good viander "— Crummer to Cromwell, on the Hon Foundation at Canterbury: Burnet's Collections, p. 493.

A purer doctrine has not corrected those careless and questionable habits in the management of property which were exposed by the visitors of 1535. Whether the cause of the phenomenon lies in an indifference to the things of the world, or in the more dubious pallution that successive incumbents have only a life interest in their incomes, the experience of three centuries has proved the singular unfitness of spiritual persons for the administration of secular trusts; and The Institute the friends of the establishment may be grade them grateful that the judgment of the English image. laity ultimately guided them to this conclusion. They were influenced, it is lakely, by a principle which they showed rather in their deeds than in their words. They would not recognise any longer the distinction on which the claims of the abbeys were rested. Property given to God, it was urged, might not be again taken from God, but must remain for ever in his service. It was replied in substance that God's service was not divided, but one; that all duties honestly done were religious duties; that the person of the layman was as nacred as the person of the priest; and the liturgy of obedience as acceptable as the liturgy of words.

Yet if, in the end, men found their way clearly, they moved towards it with slow steps; and the first resolution at which they arrived embodied partially the schemes of each of the honest reformers. In touching institutions with which the feelings of the nation were deeply connected, prudence and principle alike dictated caution. However bitterly the people might exclaim against the abbeys while they continued to stand, their faults, if they were destroyed, would soon be forgotten. Institutions which had been rooted in the country for so many centuries, retained a hold too deep to be torn away without wounding a thousand associations; and a reaction of regret would inevitably follow among men so conservative as the English, so possessed with reverence for the old traditions of their fathers. This was to be constatemen to sidered; or rather the parliament, the crown, er coning and the council felt as the people felt. Vast as the changes were which had been effected, there he I been as yet no sweeping measures. At each successive step. Henry had never moved without reluctance. He hated anarchy; he hated change: in the true spirit of an Englishman, he never surrendered an institution or a doctrine till every means had been exhausted of retaining it, consistently with allegiance to truth. The larger monasteries, therefore, with many of the rest, had yet four years allowed them to demonstrate the hopelessness of their amendment, the impossibility of their renovation. The remainder were to reap the consequences of their iniquities; and the judicial sentence was pronounced at last in a spirit as rational as ever animated the English legislature.

" Forasmuch," says the preamble of the Act of Dissolution, "as manifest sin, vicious, carnal, det for the Dissolution threader and abominable living, is daily used and comhouses. mitted among the little and small abbeys, Jonamuch. preigies a priories, and other religious houses of monks, persons in canons, and nuns, where the congregation of bays are 27such religious persons is under the number of twelve, whereby the governors of such religious houses and their convents, spoil, consume, destroy, and atterly waste their churches, monasteries, principal houses, farms, and granges, to the high disbot and the pleasure of Almighty God, the slander of front interny true religion, and to the great infamy of the King's Highress and of the realm, if redress should not be had thereof; and albeit that many continual visitations hath been heretofore had by the space of two hundred years and more, for an honest and charitable reformation of such unthrifty, carnal, and abominable living; yet nevertheless, little or none amendment is hitherto had, but their vicious living shamelessly increaseth and augmenteth, and by a cursed custom is so rooted and infested, that a great multitude of the religious persons in such small houses do rather choose to rove abroad in apostacy than to conform them to the observation of true religion; so that Authorwithout such small houses be utterly sup-ormston in pressed, and the religious persons therein hopeless, committed to great and honourable monasteries of religion in this realm, where they may be compelled to live religiously for the reformation of their lives, there can be no reformation in this behalf: in consideration hereof the King's most royal Majesty, being supreme head on earth, under God, of the Church of England. daily finding and devising the increase, advancement, and exaltation of true doctrine and virtue in the said Church, to the only glory of God, and the total extirping and destruction of vice and sin; having knowledge that the premises be true, as well by accounts of his late visitation as by sundry credible informations; considering also that divers great monasteries of this realm, wherein, thanks be to God, religion is right well kept and observed, be destitute of such full number of religious persons as they ought and may keep; hath thought good that a plain declaration should be made of the premises, as well to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal as to other his loving subjects the Commons. in this present parliament assembled. Whereupon, the TOLL OL said Lords and Commons, by a great deliberation, finally be resolved that it is and shall be It is believed that God much more to the pleasure of Almighty will be better pleased to God, and for the honour of this His realm. see the postemporar of that the possessions of such spiritual houses. tuch bouget, DOW WINTED now spent, and spoiled, and wasted for inla avii living. applied to better purcrease and maintenance of sin, should be poin. converted to better uses; and the unthrifty religious persons so spending the same be compelled to reform their lives." 1

I The parliament went on to declare, that the lands of all monasteries the incomes of which were The lauds of all having: less than two hundred pounds a-year, should less than $00/ a-year to be given to the king. be "given to the king." The monks were either to be distributed in the great abbeys, The monks " or to be dismissed with a permission," if either to be distributed. setts georga they desired it, " to live honestly and virtu-JAINE OF houses, or to be pensioned off, to live onsly abroad." "Some convenient charity" was to be allowed them for their living; and honestly abroad the chief head or governor was to have " such pension as should be commensurate with his degree or quality." All debts, whether of the houses or of the brothers individually, were to be carefully paid; and finally, one more clause was added, sufficient in itself to show the temper in which the suppression

1 27 Hen. VIII, cap. 28.

houses reputed clear inty be refetablished by the Crown.

had been resolved upon. The visitors had reported a few of the smaller abbeys as free from stain. The king was empowered, at ^{*} Either to be held under the Crown itself for purposes of State, or to be granted out as fiefs among the nobies and gentlemen of England, under such conditions as should secure the discharge of those duties which by the laws were attached to landed tenures.

The menks generally were allowed from four to eight pounds a year being the iner me of an ordinary purish priest. The principals in grasp cases had from seventy to eighty pounds a year.

his discretion, to permit them to survive; and under this parmission thirty-two houses were refounded in perpetuem eleemosynam.1

This is the history of the first suppression of the monastenee under Henry VIII. We regret the depravity by which it was occasioned; but the measure itself, in the absence of any preferable alternative, was bravely and wisely resolved. In the general imperfection of human things, no measure affecting the interests of large bodies of men was ever yet devised which has not pressed unequally, and is not in some respects open to objection. We can but choose the best among many doubtful courses, when we would be gladly spared, if we might be spared, from choosing at all.

In this great transaction, it is well to observe that the laity alone saw their way clearly. The The latty only majority of the bishops, writhing under the observe inhibitions, looked on in sullen acquiescence, submitting in a forced conformity, and believing, not without cause, that a tide which flowed so hotly would before long turn and ebb back again. Among the Reforming clergy there was neither union nor prudence; and the Protestants, in the sudden sunshine, were becoming unmanageable and extravagant. On the bench there were but four prelates who were on the moving side, — Cranmer, Latimer, Shaxton, and Barlow, and among these Cranmer only approved the policy of the government. Shaxton was an arrogant braggart, and Barlow a feeble enthusiast. Shaxton, who had flinched from the stake when Bilney was burnt, Shax-

1 Burnet's Chileotensa, p. 80.

^{*} In the autumn of 1955 Letimer had been made Bishop of Woroustes, Sharston of Salisbury, and Burlow of St. David's.

ton, who subsequently relapsed under Mary, and bevisition of came himself a Romanist persecutor, was now the Pretention strutting in his new authority, and punishing, suspending, and inhibiting in behalf of Protestant doctrines which were not yet tolerated by the law.1 Barlow had been openly preaching that purgatory was a delusion; that a layman might be a bishop; that where two or three, it might be, "cobblers or weavers," "were in company in the name of God, there was the church of God." Such ill-judged precipitancy was of darker omen to the Reformation than papel excommunications or imperial menaces, and would soon be dearly paid for in fresh martyr-fires. Latimer, too, notwithstanding his clear perception and gallant heart, looked with bitterness on the confiscation of establishments which his mind had pictured to him as garrisoned with a Reforming army, as aurseries of apostles of the truth. Like most fiery-natured men, he was ill-pleased to see the stream flowing in a channel other than that which he had marked for it; and the state of his feeling, and the state of the English world, with all its confused imaginings, in these months, is described with some distinctness in a letter written by a London curate to the Mayor of Plymouth, on the 18th of March, 1535-36, while the bill for the suppression of the abbeys. was in progress through parliament.

Right Worshipful, — On the morrow after that Letter of a Master Hawkins departed from hence, I, have to the ing nothing to do, as an idler went to Lambayor of Physical and I took a whorry at Paul's Wharf, wherein

³ Strype's Monovich, Vol. I., Appendix, p. 222; Burnet's Obsertmen.
a. 92

³ Buype's Memorials, Vol. I., Appendix, p. 173.

also was already a doctor named Crewkhorne, which was sent for to come to the Bishop of Canterbury. And he, before the three Bishops of Canterbury, Worcester, and Salisbury, confessed that he victor the was rapt into heaven, where he saw the Trinity by Dr. Cherk. Trinity sitting in a pall or mantle or cope of heave. Trinity sitting in a pall or mantle or cope of blew colour; and from the middle upward they were three bodies, and from the middle downward were they closed all three into one body. And he spake with Our Lady, and she took him by the hand, and bade him serve her as he had done in time past; and bade him preach abroad that she would be honoured at Ipswich and Willesdon as she hath been in old times.

"On Tuesday in Ember week, the Bishop of Rochester' came to Crutched Friars, and inhibited a doctor and three or four more to hear confession; and so in Cardmaker and other places. Then the Bishop of London's apparitor came and railed on the other bishops, and said that he, nor no such as he, shall have jurisdiction within his Lord's precincts. Then was the Bishop of London sent for to make answer; but he was sick and might not come. On Friday, the clergy sat on it in Convocation House a long time, and left off till another day; and in the meantime, all men that have taken loss or wrong at his hands, must bring in their bills, and shall have recompense.

on Sunday last, the Bishop of Worcester prenched at Paul's Cross, and he said that bishops, Intimer preschas at abbots, priors, parsons, canons, resident priests, Paul's Cross, and all, were strong thieves; yea, dukes, spectful to persons in lords, and all. The king, quoth he, made a sutherity marvellous good act of parliament, that certain men should sow every of them two acres of hemp; but it were all too little, even if so much more, to hang the thieves that be in England. Bishops, abbots, with such others, should not have so many servants, nor so many dishes; but to go to their first foundation; and keep hospitality to feed the needy people — not jolly fellows, with golden chains and velvet gowns; ne let these not once come into houses of religion for repast Let them call knave bishop, knave abbot, knave prior, yet feed none of them all, nor their horses, nor their dogs. Also, to eat flesh and white meat in Lent, so it be done without hurting weak consciences, and without sedition; and likewise on Fridays and all days.

1 John HReey.

"The Bishop of Canterbury saith that the King's what or Grace is at full point for friers and chauntry priests, that they shall away all, saving them that can preach. Then one said to the bishop, that they had good trust that they should serve forth their life-times; and he said they should serve it out at a cart, then, for any other service they should have by that."

The concluding paragraph of this letter is of still greater interest. It refers to the famous Vagrant Act, of which I have spoken in the first chapter of this work.¹

"On Saturday in the Ember week, the King's Grace The Vagrant came in among the burgesses of the parliaact the first ment, and delivered them a bill, and bade suppression them look upon it, and weigh it in conscience; for he would not, he said, have them pass either it or any other thing because his Grace giveth in the bill; but they to see if it be for the commonweal of his subjects, and have an eye thitherwards; and on Wednes-

1 27 Hen. VIII. cap. 25.

there shall be a proviso made for the poor people. The gaols shall be rid; the faulty shall die; and the others shall be rid by proclamation or by jury, and shall be set at liberty, and pay no fees. Sturdy beggers and such prisoners as cannot be set at work, shall be set at work at the king's charge; some at Dover, and some at places where the water hath broken over the lands. Then, if they fall to idleness, the idler shall be had before a justice of the peace, and has fault written. If he be taken idle again in another place, he shall be known where his dwelling is; and so at the second mention he shall be burned in the hand; and if he fail the third time, he shall die for it." 1

The king, as it appeared, had now the means at his disposal to find work for the unemployed; and the lands bequeathed for the benefit of the poor were reapplied, under altered forms, to their real intention. The antithesis which we sometimes hear between the charity of the monasteries - which relieved poverty for the love of God - and the worldly harshness of a poor-law, will not endure inspection. The monasteries, which had been the support of "valiant beggary," had long before transferred to the nation the maintenance of the impotent and the deserving; and the resumption of an abused trust was no more than the natural consequence of their dishonesty. I have already discussed 2 the penal clauses of this act, and 1 need not enter again upon that much-ques- The possi tioned subject. Never, however, at any period, were the labouring classes in England more generously protected than in the reign of Henry VIII.; never did any government strain the power of legislation more resolutely in their favour; and, I suppose, they would not themselves object to the reënactment of Henry's penalties against dishonesty, if they might have with them the shelter of Henry's laws.

Letter of Thomas Dorset to the Mayor of Plymouth Suppression of the Monastories, p. 86.

Vol. I. chap. L.

The session was drawing to an end. At the close of it, the government gave one more proof of their goodwill toward any portion of the church establishment which showed signs of being alive. Dune Scotus being disposed of in Bocardo, the idle residents being driven away, or compelled to employ themselves, and the professors' lectures having recovered their energy, there were hopes of good from Oxford and Cambridge: and the king conceded for them what the pope had never conceded, when the power rested with the See of Rome: he remitted formally by statute the tenths and firstfruits, which the colleges had paid in common with all other church corporations. Majesty is conscious," says the act which was passed on this occasion,1 that the enforcing of the Payment of on this occasion, that the onforcing of the destroite repayment of firstfruits against the universities, universities, and cause the stu-"may prejudice learning, and cause the students to give their minds to other things, which might not be acceptable to God; " and "he has conceived such hearty love and tender affection to the continuance of honest and virtuous living, and of the arts and sciences (wherewith it hath pleased Almighty God abundantly to endow his Highness), as that his Grace cannot compare the same to any law, constitution, or statute; por tolerate any such ordinance, though the commodtty and benefit thereof should never so much redound

1 27 Hen. VIII. cap. 49.

vancement and setting forth of the lively word of God, wherewith his people must be fed; or if it may imperil the knowledge of such other good letters as in Christian realms is expedient to be learned. He has therefore, — (for that the students should the more gladly bend their wits to the attaining of learning, and, before all things, the learning of the wholesome doctrines of Almighty God, and the three tongues, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, which be requisite for the understanding of Scripture,) — thought it convenient " to excuerate the universities from the payment of first-fruits for ever.

So closed the first great parliament of the Reformation, which was now dissolved. The Lower April 6. Dissolution of the parties The debates are lost; and the details of its ment, and proceedings are visible only in faint transient in labour. gleams. We have an epitome of two sessions in the Lords' Journale: but even this partial assistance fails us with the Commons; and the Lords in this matter were a body of secondary moment. The Lords had ceased to be the leaders of the English people; they existed as an ornament rather than a power; and under the direction of the council they followed as the stream drew them, when individually, if they had so dared, they would have chosen a far other course. The work was done by the Commons; by them the first move was made; by them and the king the campaign was carried through to victory. I And this one body of men, dim as they now seem to us, who assembled on the wreck of the administration of Wolsey, had commenced and had concluded a revolution which had reversed the foundations of the State.

4.2 The Work accomplished by Parliament. [Cu 1.

found England in dependency upon a foreign power, they left it a free nation. They found it under the despotism of a church establishment saturated with disease; and they had bound the hands of that establishment; they had laid it down under the knife, and carved away its putrid members; and stripping off its Nessus robe of splendour and power, they had awakened in it some forced remembrance of its higher call-The elements of a far deeper change were seething; a change, not in the disposition of outward authority, but in the beliefs and convictions which touched the life of the soul. This was yet to come; and the work so far was but the initial step or prelude leading up to the more solemn struggle. Yet where the enemy who is to be conquered is strong, not in vital force, but in the prestige of authority, and in the enchanted defences of superstition, those truly win the battle who strike the first blow, who deprive the idol of its terrors by daring to defy it.

CHAPTER XI.

TRIAL AND DEATH OF ANNE BOLEYN.

The first act of the great drama appeared to have closed. No further changes were for the present in contemplation. The church was reëstablished under its altered constitution; and the parliament had been dissolved under the impression that it would be unnecessary to summon another for an indefinite time.\(^1\) Within four weeks of the dissolution, writs were issued for a fresh election, under the pressure of a misfortune which is alike calamitous, under whatever aspect we regard it; and which blotted the Reformation with a black and frightful stain. The guilt must rest where it is due; but under any hypothesis, guilt there was, dark, mysterious, and most miserable.

The fate of Queen Catherine had by this time completed itself. She had taken her leave of a pean of world which she had small cause to thank for the world which she had small cause to thank for the state the entertainment which it had provided for ler; and she died, as she had lived, resolute, haughty, and unbending. In the preceding October (1585) she was in bad health; her house, she imagined, disagreed with her, and at her own desire she was removed to Kimbolton. But there were no symptoms of immediate danger. She revived under the change, and was in better spirits than the had shown for many previous months, especially after she heard of the new pope's resolution to maintain her cause. " Much resort of people came daily to her." The vexations dispute upon her title had been dropped, from an inability to press it; and it seemed as if life had become at least endurable to her, if it never could be more. But the repose was but the stillness of evening as night is hastening down. The royal officers of the household were not admitted into her presence; the queen lived wholly among her own friends and her own people; she sank unperceived; and so effectually had she withdrawn from the observation of those whom she desired to exclude, that the king was left to learn from the Spanish ambassador that the was at the point of death, before her chamberlain was aware that she was more than indisposed.¹ In the last week of December Henry learnt that she was in danger. On the 2d of January the ambassador went down from London to Kimbolton, and spent the day with her.* On the 5th, Sir Edmund Bedingfield wrote that she was very ill. and that the issue was doubtful. On the morning of the 7th she received the last sacrament, and at two o'clock on that day she died.4 On her death-Jeanway 7. o'clock on that day she died. On her death-Her last lot. bed she dictated the following letter of farewell to him whom she still called, her most dear lord and husband.

¹ Speech of the Lord Chancellers Zorde Journals, p. 84

"The hour of my death now approaching, I cannot choose but, out of the love I bear you, advise you of your soul's health, which you ought to prefer before all considerations of the world or flesh whatsoever; for which yet you have cast me into many calamities, and yourself into many troubles. But I forgive you all and pray God to do so likewise. For the rest I commend unto you Mary our daughter, beseeching you to be a good father to her, as I have heretofore desired I must entreat you also to respect my maids, and give them in marriage, which is not much, they being but three; and to all my other servants a year's pay besides their due, lest otherwise they should be unprovided for. Lastly, I make this vow, that mine eyes desire you above all things. Farewell."1

¹ Strype's Memorials, Vol. I. p. 370.

4 Mate Papers, Vol. I. p. 452

³ Sir Edmund Bedingfield to Cromwell: State Papers, Vol. L. p. 451. ⁵ Strype's Memorials, Vol. L.; and see Appendix, p. 941, et seq.

This letter reached Henry with the intimation that she was gone. He was much affected, and is said to have shed tears.1

The court was ordered into mourning — a command which Anne Boleyn distinguished herself by Shale bouled at Peterborough, with the estate of Princess Peterborough Royal; 4 and shortly after, on the foundation in founded as of the new bishoprics, the See of Peterborough of her.

was established in her memory. We may welcome,

Lord Herbert, p. 188.

² Lord Harbart, p. 188. It will have been observed, that neither in this letter, nor in the other authentic papers connected with her death is there any allusion to Cardinal Pole's famous story, that being on her deathbeil, Queen Catherine prayed the king to allow her to see her daughter for the met time, and that the request was refused. Pole was not in England at the time. He draw his information from Catholic rumour, as vindictive as it was credulous; and in the many latters from members of the privy counall to him which we possess, his nerrative is treated as throughout a mere wild collection of fables. I raquire some better evidence to persuade me that the story is any truer than the rest, when we know that Catherine allowed the king to hear that she was dying, not from herself, but from a foreign ambassader; and that such a request could have been made in the tew days which intervened between this intimation and her death, without some traces of it appearing in the class account which we passess of her language and actions during those days, is in a high degree unlikely.

See Lingard, Vol. V. p. 80. Hall says : " Queen Anne were yellow

The directions for the funeral are printed in Lingard Vol. Y., Appear dix, p. 967.

however late, these acts of tardy respect. Henry, in the few last years, had grown wiser in the ways of women; and had learnt to prize more deeply the austerity of virtue, even in its unloveliest aspect.

The death of Catherine was followed, four months later, by the tragedy which I have now to relate. The ground on which I am about to tread is so critical, and the issues at stake affect so deeply the honour of many of our most eminent English statesmen, that I must be pardoned if I cannot here step boldly out with a flowing narrative, but must pick my way slowly as I can: and I, on my part, must ask my readers to move slowly also, and be content to allow their judgment, for a few pages, to remain in suspense.

And first, I have to say that, as with all the great events of Henry's reign, so especially with this, we must trust to no evidence which is not strictly contemporary. During periods of revolution, years do the work of centuries in colonring actions and disturbing forms; and events are transferred swiftly from the de-

It ought not to be necessary to say that her will was respected — Lord Herbert, p. 188; but the king's conduct to Catherine of Arragon has prevoked suspicion even where suspicion is unjust; and much mistaken declamation has been wasted in connexion with the matter upon an offence wholly imaginary.

In making her bequests, Catherine continued to regard hereelf as the king's wife, in which capacity she professed to have no power to dispose of her property. She left her legacies in the form of a petition to her hashand. She had named no axecutors; and being in the eyes of the law " a sele woman, " the administration lapsed in consequence to the nearest of kin, the emperor. Some embarrassment was thus created, and the attorney-general was obliged to evade the difficulty by a legal satisfies, before he king could take possession, and give effect to the bequests — See Strype's Mesor. Vol. I., Appendix, pp. 252-255. Miss Strickland's valuable valuaces are so generally read, that I venture to ask her to reconsider the passage which she has written on this subject. The king's offences against Catherine require no unnecessary exaggreration.

liberation of the judgment to the precipitate arrogance of party spirit. When the great powers of Europe were united against Elizabeth, and when Elizabeth's own character was vilely and wantonly assailed, the Catholic writers dipped their pens in the stains which blotted her mother's name; and, more careless of truth than even theological passion can excuse, they poured out over both alike a stream of indiscriminate calumny. On the other hand, as Elizabeth's lordly nature was the pride of all true-hearted Englishmen, so the Reformers laboured to reflect her virtues backwards. the Catholics, they linked the daughter with the parent; and became no less extravagant in their panegyrics than their antagonists in their gratuitous invective. But the Anne Boleyn, as she appears in contemporary letters, is not the Anne Boleyn of Foxe, or Wyatt, or the other champions of Protestantism, who saw in her the counterpart of her child. These writers, though living so near to the events which they described, yet were divided from the preceding generation by an impassable gulf. They were surrounded with the heat and flame of a controversy, in which public and private questions were wrapped inseparably together; and the more closely we accutinize their narratives, the graver occasion there appears for doing so.

While, therefore, in following out this miserable subject, I decline so much as to entertain the Rules to de stories of Sanders, who has represented Juliana this Queen Anne as steeped in profligacy from quanton ner elilchood, so I may not any more accept those tate memorials of her saintliness, which are alike unsupported by the evidence of those who knew her. If Protestant legends are admitted as of authority, the Catholic legends must enter with them, and we shall only deepen the confusion. I cannot follow Burnet, in reporting out of Meteren a version of Anne Boleyn's trial, unknown in England. The subject is or on which rhetoric and rumour are alike unprofitable. We must confine ourselves to accounts written at the line by persons to whom not the outline of the facts only was known, but the circumstances which surrour led them; by persons who had seen the evidence upon he alleged offences, which, though now lost irrecoverably, can be proved to have once existed.

We are unable, as I early observed, to form any property of trustworthy judgment of Anne Boleyn before her marriage. Her education had been in the worst school in Europe. On her return from the French court to England, we have seen her entangled in an unintelligible connexion with Lord Percy; and if the account sent to the Emperor was true, she was Lord Percy's actual wife; and her conduct was so criminal as to make any after-charges against her credible.

If the Protestants, again, found in her a friend and supporter, she was capable, as Wolsey experienced, of inveterate hatred; and although among the Reformers the had a reputation for generosity, which is widely onfirmed,² yet it was exercised always in the direction in which her interests pointed; and kindness of feeling is not incompatible, happily, with seriously melancholy faults.

The strongest general evidence in her favour is that of Cranmer, who must have known her intimately, and who, at the crisis of her life, declared that he "never had better opinion in woman than

See Val. I. pp. 175, 176.

^{*} Foxe speaks very strongly on this point. In Ellis's Letters we find many detailed instances, and indeed in all contemporary authorities

he had in her." 1 Yet there had been circumstances it. her conduct, as by her own after confessions was amply evident, which justified Sir Thomas More in foretelling a stormy end to her splendour; and her relations with the king, whether the fault rested with him, or rested with her, grew rapidly cool when she Early coolwas his wife. In 1534, perhaps sooner, both her and she herself, her brother, and her relations had Henry made themselves odious by their insolence; her overbearing manners had caused a decline in the king's affection for her; and on one side it was reported that he was likely to return to Catherine,8 on the other that he had transferred his attention to some other lady, and that the court encouraged his inconstancy to separate him from Anne's influence.4 D'Inteville confirms the account of a new love affair, particularising nothing, but saying merely that Anne was falling out of favour; and that the person alluded to as taking her place was Jane Seymour, appears from a letter written after Anne's execution, by the Regent Mary to the Emperor of Austria, and from the letter written (supposing it genuine) by Anne herself to the king before her trial.

Cranmer's Letter to the King: Burnet, Yel. L.p. 323.

More's Life of More; and see Chap. IX.

Il Re de inghilterra haveva fatto venire in la Corte sus il majordome de la Regine et mostrava esserse mitigate alquanto. La causa della mitigation procede del buon negotiar ha fatto et fa la Catolica Maria con la Ambaniatore del Re de Inghilterra con persuad ria con buoni paroli et pregeri che debbia restituir la Regina in la antigua dignita-

Dicano anchore che la Anna e mai voluta degli S di lughikerra si per la sua superbia, si anche per l'ansolentia et mali postementi che fanno sel regno li fratelli e parenti di Anna e che per questo il Re non la porta la abfazione que solova. — "Nuovas de lughiterra" i MS. Archives of Sia angue.

Il Re festeggia una altra donna della quale se mostra esser insmorate a molti S di Inghilterra lo ajutano nel seguir el preditto amore per desviar quasto Re de la pratica di Anna. — Ibid

4 Burnet's Collectonen, p. 87

WOL. IL.

On the other hand, it is equally clear that whether provoked or not by infidelity on the part of Henry, her own conduct had been singularly questionable. We know very little, but waiving for the present the exposures at her trial, we know, by her own confession, that arrogance and vanity had not been her only faults, and that she had permitted the gentlemen who were the supposed partners of her guilt, to speak to her of their passion for herself.¹

In January, 1585, Henry's mind had been filled with "doubts and strange suspicions" about his wife. There had been a misunderstanding, in which she had implored the intercession of Francis I.²

In February, 1536, she miscarried, with a dead boy, which later rumour dwelt on as the cause of the coolers Henry's displeasure. But conversations such as those which she described with her supposed paramours, lay bars far deeper wounds of domestic unhappiness; and assure us, that if we could look behind the scenes, we should see there estrangements, quarrels, jealousies, the thousand dreary incidents that, if we knew them, would break the suddenness with which at present the catastrophe bursts upon us. It is the want of preparation, the blank ignorance in which we are left of the daily life and daily occurrences of the court, which places us at such disadvantage for recovering the truth. We are unable to form any estimate whatever of those antecedent likelihoods which, in the events of our own ordinary lives, guide our judgment so imperceptibly, yet so surely. Henry is said to have been i. constant, but those who most suspected Henry's motives charge Anne at the same time with a long notorious profligacy. We cannot say what is probable or what is improbable; except, indeed, that the antethe guilt of every person is improbable anteamount to cedent to evidence; and in the present instance, since, either on the side of the queen or of the king, there was and must have been most terrible guilt, these opposite presumptions neutralize each other.

Pligrim, p. 117.

⁵ La Labourger, I. 405: quoted in Lingard, Vol. V. p. 39.

To proceed with the story. Towards the middle of April, 1536, certain members of the privy April council were engaged secretly in receiving Sent investigation by a tery. Nothing is known of the quarter from counsil. which the information came which led to the inquiry.$ Something, however, there was to call for inquiry, or something there was thought to be; and on the 24th of April the case was considered sufficiently complete to make necessary a public trial. On that day an order was issued for a special commission. The members of the tribunal were selected with a care proportioned to the solemnity of the occasion.* It was composed of the lord chancellor, the first noblemen of the realm, and of the judges. The investigation had, however, been conducted so far with profound secrecy; and the object for which it was to assemble was unknown even to Cranmer, himself a member of the privy council.4 With the same mysterious silence on April 27. the cause of so unexpected a measure, the win in section writs were assued for a general election, and ment.

Quoy qu'il es soit l'on ers luy peult fure grand tort quand cires l'un a reputé pour meschants. Car ce a este des longtemps son stile. — The lie gent Mary to Peulinand: MS. Brussel.

^{*} I ater writers point to the ladies of the court, but report could not agree upon any single person; and sothing is really known.

Baga de Secretis, pouch 8: Append x II. to the Third Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Public Records.

Cranmer to the King: Burnet, Vol. I p. 322.

parliament was required to assemble as soon as possible.1 On Thursday, the 27th, the first arrest April 27; arrest of Sir William was made. Sir William Brereton,2 a gentleman of the king's household, was sent sud-Brereius (and on Sundenly to the Tower: and on the Sunday day April 80, of Mark after, Mark Smeton, of whom we know only Smeton. that he was a musician high in favour at the court, apparently a spoilt favourite of royal bounty. The day May 1 following was the 1st of May. It was the locromous day on which the annual festival was held at Greenwich, and the queen appeared, as usual, with her husband and the court at the tournament. Lord Rochfort, the queen's brother, and Sir Henry Norris. both of them implicated in the fatal charge, were defender and challenger. The tilting had commenced, when the king rose suddenly with signs of disturbance in his manner, left the court, and rode off with a small company to London. Rumour, which delights in dramatic explanations of great occurrences, has discovered that a handkerchief dropped by the queen, and caught by Norris, roused Henry's jealousy; and that his after conduct was the result of a momentary anger. The incidents of the preceding week are a sufficient reply to this romantic story. The mine was already laid, the match was ready for the fire.

Stepney; but he seems inconsistent with himself. See his Memorial, Arrhoningie, Vel. XXIII. p. 68.

• His name repeatedly occurs in "the Privy Purse Expenses of Henry VIII"

I must draw particular attention to thin. Parliament had been just dissolved, and a fresh body of untried men were called together for no other purpose than to take cognizance of the supposed discovery. — See the Speech of the Lord Chancellor: Lords' Journals, p. 64. If the accumulations were intentionally forged by the king, to go out of the way to court on usedless publicity was an act most strange and most incomprehensible.

The king did not return: he passed the night in London, and Anne remained at Greenwich. On the morning of Tuesday the privy council assem- Tuesday, May 2, are bled in the palace under the presidency of rest of the the Duke of Norfolk, and she was summoned privy country to the to appear before it. The Duke of Norfolk, Gresselett her uncle, was anxious, as Burnet insinuates, on political grounds that his niece should be made away with. Such accusations are easily brought, especially when unsupported by evidence. She was unpopular from her manner. The London merchants looked on her with no favour as having caused a breach in the alkance with Flanders, and the duke was an imperialist and at heart a friend of Queen Catherine; but he had grown old in the service of the state with an unblemished reputation; and he felt too keenly the disgrace which Anne's conduct had brought upon her fam.ly, to have contrived a scheme for her removal at once so awkward and so ignominious. On her examination. she declared herself innocent; the details medicare of what passed are unknown; only she ence. told Sir William Kingston that she was cruelly handled at Greenwich with the king's council: "and that the Duke of Norfolk, in answer to her defence, had said, 'Tut, tut, tut,' shaking his head three or four times."3 The other prisoners were then examined:

Eingston to Grouwell: Singar's Cavendrsh, p. 456 at seq., in Strype's Montrick, Vol. L.

I Five years later, after the shameful behaviour of Catherine Howard, the duke wrote to the king of "the aboutable deeds done by two of my meres equival your Highman;" which he said have "brought me into the greatest perplantly that ever poor wrotch was in, fearing that your Majesty, having so often and by so many of my kyn been thus funcly and traitorously handled, might not only concaive a displeasure in your heart against me and all other of that kyn, but also in manner abbor to hear speak of any of the same."— Norfolk to Henry VIII. State Papers, Vol. I. p. 791.

both Brereton, it would seem, but Smeton, who must be been brought down from the Tower, and Sir Henry Norris, and Sir Francis Weston, two young courtiers, who had both of them been the trusted friends of the king. Each day the shadow was stretching further. The worst was yet to come.

On being first questioned, these three made general admissions, but denied resolutely that any actual offence had been committed. On being pressed further and cross-examined, Smeton confessed to actual Tuesday. adultery. 1 Norris hesitated: being pressed, 8 m eton confessor, however, by Sir William Fitzwilliam to speak and Norris, Who affairthe truth, he also made a similar acknowledgwards, how-STORE. ment, although he afterwards withdrew from withdraws from what what he had said. Weston persisted in declaring himself innocent. The result was unsatisfactory, and it was thought that it would "much touch the king's honour" if the guilt of the accused was not proved more clearly. "Only Mark," Sir Edward Baynton said, would confess "of any actual thing" 3. although he had no doubt "the other two" were "as fully culpable as ever was he." They were, however, for the present, recommitted to the Tower: whither also in the afternoon the council conducted the queen, and left her in the custody of Sir William Kingston.

¹ Sir Edward Baynton to the Lord Treasurer, from Greenwich: Bingef's Cavendish, p. 458.

² See Lingard, Vol. V. p. 34. It is not certain whether the examination of the prisonest was at Greenwich or at the Tower. Bayaten a lenger is dated from Greenwich, but that is not conclusive. Constantyne says (Archeologic, Vol. XXIII. p. 63) that the king took Norris with him to London, and, as he beard say, urged him all the way to confess, with promises of pardon if he would be honest with him. Norris persisted in his denial, however, and was committed to the Tower. Afterwards, before the council, he confessed. On his trial, his confession was read to him, and he said he was deceived into making it by $ir W Fitzwilliam: an accompany against this gentleman very difficult to believe.

Letter to the Lord Treasurer.

She was brought up the river; the same river along which the sailed in splendour only three short The queen, years before. She landed at the same Tower noon, is taken to the Stairs; and, as if to complete the bitter misery Town. of the change, she was taken "to her own lodgings in which she lay at her coronation." She had feared that she was to go to a dungeon. When Kingston told her that these rooms had been prepared for her. " It is too good for me," she said, " Jesu have mercy on me; " " and kneeled down, weeping a great space; and in the same sorrow fell into a great laughing."1 She then begged that she might have the sacrament in the closet by her chamber, that she one, soil might pray for mercy, declaring "that she the sacrawas free from the company of man as for sloot. sin," and was "the king's true wedded wife."

She was aware that the other prisoners were in the Tower, or, at least, that Smeton, Weston, and Norris were there. Whether she knew at that time of the further dreadful accusation which was hanging over her, does not appear; but she asked anxiously for her brother; and, if she had suspected anything, her fears must have been confirmed by Kingston's evasive replies. It is so painful to dwell upon the words and actions of a poor woman in her moments of misery, that Kingston may describe his conversation with her in his own words. Lord Rochfort had returned to London at liberty; he seems to have been arrested the name Tuesday afternoon. "I pray you," she said, "to tell me where my Lord Rochfort is?"—"I told her,"

⁵ Kingston to Cromwell; Singer's Cavendish, p. 451.

Kingston wrote, that " I saw him afore dinner, in the court." "Oh, where is my sweet brother?" she went on. "I said I left him at York-place; and so I did. hear say," said she, "that I should be accused with three men; and I can say no more but nay, without I should open my body," - and therewith she opened her gown, saying, "Oh, Norris, hast thou accused me ? Thou art in the Tower with me, and thou and I shall die together. And, Mark, thou art here too. Oh, my mother, thou wilt die for sorrow." And much she lamented my Lady of Worcester, for because her child did not stir in her body. And my wife said, "What should be the cause?" She said. "For the sorrow she took for me." And then she said, "Mr. Kingston, shall I die without justice?" And I said, " The poorest subject the king hath, had justice:" and therewith she laughed." 1

Lady Boleyn, her aunt, had been sent for, with a Mrs. Cousins, and two other ladies, selected Lady Boleyo and by the king.1 They were ordered to attend three other laction supt upon the queen, but to observe a strict siboattend. lence; and to hold no communication with apor, ber. her, except in the presence of Lady Kingston. This regulation, it was found, could not be insisted on, Lady Boleyn and Mrs. Cousins slept in the queen's room, and conversation could not be prevented. Mrs. Cousins undertook, on her part, to inform Kingston if anything was said which "it was meet that he should Know." 8 1 Kingston to Cromwell: Singer's Cavendish, p. 451.

Doi: 10.458

I She said, "I think it much unkindness in the king to put our's about me as I never loved." I showed her that the king took them to 's bonest and good women. 'But I would have had of mine own prive a suber,' she said, "which I favour most." — Kingston to Cromwell: Ibid 457

In compliance with this promise, she told him, the next morning, that the queen had been speak- wetnesday, ing to her about Norris. On the preceding Beyorded Sunday, she said that Norris had offered to of the queon "swear for the queen, that she was a good with Norris, woman." - "But how," asked Mrs. Cousins, very naturally, " how came any such things to be spoken of at all? "-- " Marry," the queen said, " I bade him do so: for I asked him why he went not through with his marriage; and he made answer, that he would tarry a time. Then, I said, You look for dead men's shoes; for if aught came to the king but good, you would look to have me. And he said, if he should bave any such thought, he would his head were off. And then she said she could undo him, if she would. And therewith they fell out." "But the said she more feared Weston; for on Whitsun Tues- And with the Francis day last, Weston told her that Norris came works. more unto her chamber for her than for Mage." 2 Afterwards, "The queen spake of Weston, that she had spoken to him, because he did love her kinswoman, Mrs. Skelton, and that she said he loved not his wife; and he made answer to her again, that he loved one in her house better than them both. She asked him who is that? to which he answered, that it is yourself. 'And then,' she said, 'she defied him.' " a legs — had already begun to show itself.

1 The disorder of which the king ultimately died — alcoration at the

* Kingsten to Cromwell: Singer, pp. 452, 453. Of Smeton she said, "Ha

The lady, perhaps, to whom Norris was to have been murried. Sir El-ward Baynton toakes un all uson to a Mastress Margery. The passage is so injured as to be almost un stelligible — "I have mused much et of Mistress Margery, which hash used her . . . strangely towards me of late, being her friend as I have been. But no doubt it cannot be but she must be of councell therewith. There hash been great friendship between the queen and her of late." — Sir E. Haynton to the Lord Treasurer-binger, p. 458.

our very atmost commiseration for this unhappy woman; if she was guilty, it is the more reason that we should pity her; but I am obliged to say, that convercations of this kind, admitted by herself, disentitle her to plead her character in answer to the charges against her. Young men do not speak of love to young and beautiful married women, still less to ladies of so high rank, unless something more than levity has encouraged them; and although to have permitted such language is no proof of guilt, yet it is a proof of the absence of innocence.

Meanwhile, on the Tuesday morning, a rumour of the queen's arrest was rife in London; and The news Probes Cranmer. the news for the first time reached the ears He is ordered of Cranmer. The archbishop was absent to Lambeth till be hears from home, but in the course of the day forther he received an order, through Cromwell, to repair to his palace, and remain there till he heard further. With what thoughts he obeyed this command may be gathered from the letter which, on the following morning, he wrote to Henry. The fortunes of the Reformation had been so closely linked to those of the queen, that he trambled for the consequences to the church of the king's too just indignation. If the barren womb of Catherine had seemed a judgment against the first marriage, the shameful issue of the was never in my chamber but at Winchester;" she had sent for him " to play on the virginals," for there her lodging was above the king's....

"I never spoke with him since," she added, " but upon Saturday before May day, and then I found him standing in the mand window in my chamber of presence, and I asked why he was so sad, and he answered and said! was no matter; and then she said, " You may not look to have me speak to you se I should to a nobleman, because you be an inferior person."—" No, madam; a look sufficeth me [he said], and thus fare you well." — Blager, p. 455.

second might be regarded too probably as a witness against that and against every act which had been connected with it. Full of these forebodings, yet not too wholly occupied with them to forget the unhappy queen, he addressed the king, early on Wednesday, in the following language: -

" Please it your most noble Grace to be advertised, that at your Grace's commandment, by Mr. He writes to the king. He implement the large to the la name, I came to Lambeth yesterday, and there bear his min I do remain to know your Grace's further a man, pleasure. And forasmuch as without your Grace's commandment, I dare not, contrary to the contents of the said letter, presume to come unto your Grace's presence; nevertheless, of my most bounden duty, I can do no less than most humbly to desire your Grace, by your great wisdom, and by the assistance of God's help, somewhat to suppress the deep sorrows of your Grace's heart, and to take all adversities of God's hands both patiently and thankfully. I cannot deny but your Grace hath good cause many ways of lamentable heaviness; and also, that in the wrongful estimation of the world, your Grace's honour of every part is so highly touched (whether the things that commonly be spoken of be true or not), that I remember not that ever Almighty God sent unto your Grace any like occasion to try your Grace's constancy throughout, whether your Highness can be content to take of God's hands as well things displeasant as pleasant. And to se-And if He find in your most noble heart drely the such an obedience unto his will, that your God has must Grace, without murmuration and over-much heaviness, do accept all adversities, not less thanking Him than when all things succeed after your Grace's will and pleasure, then I suppose your Grace did never thing more acceptable unto Him since your first govemance of this your realm. And moreover, your Grace shall give unto Him occasion to multiply and increase his graces and benefits unto your Highness, as He did unto his most faithful servant Job; unto whom, after his great calamities and heaviness, for his obedient heart and willing acceptation of God's scourge and rod, addidit Dominus cuncta duplicia. And if it be true that is openly reported of the Queen's Grace, if men had a right estimation of things, they should not esteem any part of your Grace's honour to be touched thereby; but her honour to be clean disparaged. And I am in such perploxity, that my mind is clean amazed; for I never had better opinion in woman than I had in her: which maketh me to think that she should not be culpable. And again, I think your Highness would not have gone so far, except she had been surely sulpable.

Google

Now I think that your Grace best knoweth that, of the queen's next unto your Grace, I was most bound unto her of all creatures living. Wherefore, what to be leve.

I most humbly beseech your Grace to suffer me in that which both God's law, nature, and also her kindness bindeth me unto: that is, that I may with your Grace's favour wish and pray for her that she may declare herself inculpable and innocent. And if she be found culpable, considering your Grace's goodness to her, and from what condition your Grace's goodness to her, and from what condition your Grace's faithful servant and subject, nor true unto the realm, that would not desire the offence without mercy to be punished, to the example of all other.

And as I loved her not a little for the love which I judged her to bear towards God and his gos- pasition pel; so if she be proved culpable, there is at berbe not one that loveth God and his gospel that with all er. will ever favour her, but must hate her above the dishonour all other; and the more they favour the gospel, her brought the more they will hate her; for there never good was creature in our time that so much slandered the gospel. And God hath sent her this punishment for that she feignedly hath professed his gospel in her mouth, and not in heart and deed. And though she hath offended so that she hath deserved never to be reconciled to your Grace's favour, yet Almighty God hath manifoldly declared his goodness towards your Grace, and never offended you. But your Grace, I am sure, acknowledgeth that you have offended Him. Wherefore, I trust that your Grace will hear no less to trust. entire favour unto the truth of the gospel will a on the date to be than you did before; forasmuch as your your the gos-Grace's favour to the gospel was not led by before. affection unto her, but by zeal unto the truth. thus I beseech Almighty God, whose gospel he hath ordained your Grace to be defender of, ever to preserve your Grace from all evil, and give you at the end the promise of his gospel. From Lambeth, the third of May."

The letter was written; it was not, however, sent upon the instant; and in the course of the Helicani to norning the archbishop was requested to Chamber meet the Lord Chamberlain, Lord Oxford, Lord Sussex, and the Lord Chamberlain, in the Star Chamber. He went, and on his return to Lambeth he added a few words in a postscript. In the interview Tax postscript of the words which he had at the moment returned, his latter those noblemen, he said, had declared unto him such things as his Grace's pleasure was they should make him privy unto; for the which he was most bounden unto his Grace. "What communications we had togetner," he added, "I doubt not but they will make the true report thereof unto your Grace. I am exceedingly sorry that such faults can be proved by the queen, as I heard of their relation."

If we may believe, as I suppose we may, that Cranmer was a man of sound understanding, and of not less than ordinary probity, this letter is of the greatest value; it shows the impression which was made upon a sensible person by the first rumours of the discovery; it shows also the archbishop's opinion of the king's character, with the effect upon his own mind of the evidence which the chancellor, at the king's command, had laid before him.

We return to the prisoners in the Tower. Mark Smeton, who had confessed his guilt, was ironed.2 The other gentlemen, not in consideration of their silence, but of their rank, were treated more leniently. To the queen, with an object which may be variously interpreted, Henry wrote the Friday succeeding her arrest, holding out hopes of forgiveness if Friday, May 6. she would be honest and open with him. Henry writes to the queen Persons who assume that the whole transacwith a promhe of partion was the scheme of a wicked husband to don if she will confess. dispose of a wife of whom he was weary, will

2 Printed in Rurnet, Vol. I. p. 322, et seq.

[&]quot;Mark is the worst cheriched of any man in the house, for he wears gons." — Kingston to Cromwell. Later writers have naured themselves that fireton's confession was exterted from him by premises of pardon. Why, then, was the government so impolitie as to treat him with especial hardness so early in the transaction? When he found himself "freezed," he must have been assured that faith would not be kept with him, and he had abundant time to withdraw what he had said.

believe that he was practising upon her terror to obtain his freedom by a lighter crime than murder. Those who consider that he possessed the ordinary qualities of humanity, and that he was really convinced of her guilt, may explain his offer as the result of natural feeling. But in whatever motive his conduct angunated, it was ineffectual. Anne, either know- the projets ing that she was innocent, or trusting that is maintain her guilt could not be proved, trusting, as bootsoo, Sir Edmund Baynton thought, to the constancy of West on and Norris, declined to confess anything. " If any man accuse me," she said to there was a witness of berguitt bring no witness." Instead of acknowledging any guilt in herself, she perhaps retaliated upon the king in the celabrated letter which has been thought a proof both of her own innocence, and of the conspiracy by which she was destroyed. This letter also, although at once so well known and of so dubious authority, it is fair to give entire.

"Sir, — Your Grace's displeasure and my imprisonment are things so strange unto me, as what to write,

I The sentence is mutilated, but the meaning seems intelligible: "The queen standeth stiffly in her opinion that she we . . . which I think is in the trust that she [bath in the] other two,"—La. Norris and Weston.—Bayaton to the Lord Treasurer. The government seems to have been aware of some secret communication between her and Norris — Ibid Singer, p. 488.

^{*} Kingston to Cremwell: Singer, p. 457.

If y first impression of this letter was strongly in favour of its authoricity. I still allow it to stand in the text because it exists, and because there is no avidence, external or internal, to prove it to be a furgery. The more carefully I have examined the MS., however, the greater ancertainty I have felt about it. It is not an original. It is not an official copy. If does not appear, though here I cannot speak conclusively, to be even a contamporary copy. The only guide to the date is the watermark on the paper, and in this instance the evidence is indecisive. — Note to the 3d edition.

or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas but of the start of the line to a truth, and to obtain your favour) by such the line. an one whom you know to be mine antient professed enemy, I no sooner conceived this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your command.

"But let not your Grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault where not so much as a thought thereof proceeded. Now primes And to speak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Anne Boleyn; with which name and place I could willingly have contented myself, if God and your Grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget myself in my exaltation or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as now I find: for the ground of my preferment looked for being on no surer foundation than your Grace's fancy, the least alteration I knew was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other subject. You have chosen me from a low estate to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your Grace, let not any light fancy or bad counsel of mine enemies withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain, of a disloyal heart towards your good Grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant princess, your daughter.

"Try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial; and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and my judges; yea, let me receive Bho bear for an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shirting shame. Then shall you see either mine innocency cleared, your suspicions and conscience satisfied, the ignoming and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared; so that, whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your Grace may be And if the freed from an open censure; and mine ofHeary may tence being so lawfully proved, your Grace lawfully fotlow his new is at liberty, both before God and man, not theory. only to execute worthy punishment on me, as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection already settled on that party for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed nato; your Grace not being ignorant of my suspicion therein.

But if you have already determined of me; and that not only my death, but an infamous if her alleged slander, must bring you the enjoying of your decided, the provided happiness; then I desire of God that will parlie be will pard your great ain therein, and that he will pard your great ain therein, and that He will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgment-seat, where both you and myself must shortly appear; and in whose judgment, I doubt not, whatsoever the world may think of me, mine innocence shall be openly known and sufficiently cleared.

My last and only request shall be, that myself may only bear the burden of your Grace's And the displeasure, and that it may not touch the death may more souls of those poor gentlemen who, the poor good the poor

VOL. III.

onment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Anne Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request; and I will so leave to trouble your Grace any further; with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity, to have your Grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this 6th of May. Your most loyal and ever faithful wife,

Anne Boleyn."

This letter is most affecting; and although it is better calculated to plead the queen's cause with posterity than with the king, whom it could only exasperate, yet if it is genuine it tells (so far as such a composition can tell at all) powerfully in her favour. same page of the manuscript, carrying the same authority, and subject to the same doubt, is a fragment of another letter, supposed to have been written subsequently, and therefore in answer to a sec-A serond requildition to ond invitation to confess. In this she replied confess from the king and again, that she could confess no more than A BERGOOD DO she had already spoken; that she might conceal nothing from the king, to whom she did acknowledge herself so much bound for so many favours; for raising her first from a mean woman to be a marchioness; next to be his queen; and now, seeing he could bestow no further honours upon her on earth, for pur-The tone of posing by martyrdom to make her a saint the queen 's MARKETT DOS in heaven.3 This answer also was unwise in what it ought to point of worldly prudence; and I am obliged MAYS BOOK. gren on ket to add, that the tone which was assumed, both gaire ode gree in this and in her first letter, was unbecoming (even if she was innocent of actual sin) in a wife who, on her own showing, was so gravely to blame. It is to be remembered that she had betrayed from the first the king's confidence; and, as she knew at the moment at which she was writing, she had never been legally married to him.

¹ Burnst's Collectones, p. 37; Cotton. Mil.

^{*} Strype's Eccles. Memorials, Vol. L. Lord Bacon speaks of these wering a message sent by the queen on the morning of the execution.

Her spirits meanwhile had something rallied, though still violently fluctuating. "One hour," wrote Kingston,1 "she is determined to die, and the next hour much contrary to that." Sometimes she talked in a wild, wandering way, wondering whether He was any one made the prisoners' beds, with other Town. of those light trifles which women's minds dwell upon so strangely, when strained beyond their strength. "There would be no rain," she said, " till she was out of the Tower; and if she died, they would see the greatest punishment for her that ever came to England." "And then," she added, "I shall be a saint in heaven, for I have done many good deeds in my days; but I think it much unkindness in the king to put such about me as I never loved." * Kingston was a hard chronicler, too convinced of the queen's guilt to feel compassion for her; and yet these rambling fancies are as touching as Ophelia's; and, unlike hers, are no creation of a poet's imagination, but words once truly uttered by a poor human being in her hour of agony. Yet they proved nothing. And if her wanderings seem to breathe of innocence, they are yet compatible with the absence of it. We must remind ourselves that two of the prisoners had already confessed both their own guilt and hers.

The queen demanded a trial; it was not necessary

Kingston to Cromwell: Singer, p. 456. * Ibid. p. 457.

plices were tried with a scrupulousness without a proparations parallel, so far as I am aware, in the criminal records of the time. The substance of the proceedings is preserved in an official summary; 1 and distressing as it is to read of such sad matters, the importance of arriving at a fair judgment must excuse the details which will be entered into. The crime was alike hideous, whether it was the crime of the queen or of Henry; we may not attempt to hide from ourselves the full deformity of it.

On the 24th of April, then, a special commission was appointed, to try certain persons for offences committed at London, at Hampton Court, and at the palace at Greenwich. The offences in question having been committed in Middlesex and in Kent, bills were first to be returned by the grand juries of both counties.

Men are apt to pass vaguely over the words " a commission" or "a jury," regarding them rather as mechanical abstractions than as bodies of responsible men. I shall therefore give the list of the persons who, in these or any other capacities, were engaged upon the trials. The special commission The names of the comconsisted of Sir Thomas Audeley, the lord azipin of ald za appointed to chancellor; the Duke of Norfolk, uncle of queen'y Methe queen and of Lord Rochfort; the Duke DOUGHT OUT. of Suffolk, the king's brother - in - law; the Earl of Wiltshire, the queen's father; the Earls of Oxford, Westmoreland, and Sussex: Lord Sandys; Thomas Cromwell: Sir William Fitzwilliam the Lord High

³ Baga de Secretis, pouches 8 and 9: Appendix II. to the Third Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Public Records.

Admiral, an old man whose career had been of the most distinguished brilliancy; Sir William Paulet, lord treasurer, afterwards Marquis of Winchester; and, finally, the nine judges of the Courts of Westminster, Sir John Fitziames, Sir John Beldewyn, Sir Richard Lister, Sir John Porte, Sir John Spelman, Sir Walter Luke, Sir Anthony Fitzherbert, Sir Thomas Engleaeld, and Sir William Shelley. The duty of this tribucal was to try the four commoners accused of adultery. with the queen. She herself, with her brother, The queen would be tried by the House of Lords. the seven peers, three were her own nearest connexions; the remaining commissioners Lords. were those who, individually and professionally, might have been considered competent for the conduct of the cause above all other persons in the realm. dently to experience, we should not have expected that a commission so constituted would have lent itself to a conspiracy; and if foul play had been intended, we should have looked to see some baser instruments se-

In the middle of the second week in May, the grand juries had completed their work. On the 10th, a true bill was found at Westminster, by the oaths of Giles Heron, Esq.; May 10. True bill minster, by the oaths of Giles Heron, Esq.; Stand jury of Middle of lected for so iniquitous a purpose.

On the 11th a true bill was found at Deptford by the oaths of Sir Richard Clement, Sir William Fynche, Sir Edward Boughton, Anthony liam Fynche, Sir Edward Boughton, Anthony St. Leger, Esq.; John Cromer, Esq.; John Fogg, Esq.; Thomas Wylleford, Esq.; John Norton, Esq.; Humphrey Style, Esq.; Robert Fisher, gentleman; Thomas Sybbell, gentleman; John Lovelace, gentleman; Walter Harrington, gentleman; Edmund Page, gentleman; Thomas Fereby, gentleman, and Lionel Ansty, gentleman.

I am thus particular in recording the names of these jurors, before I relate the indictment which was found by them, because, if that indictment was unjust, it stamps their memory with eternal infamy; and with the judges, the commissioners, the privy council, the king, with every living person who was a party, active or passive, to so enormous a calumny, they must be remembered with shame for ever.

The indictment, then, found by the grand jury of Middlesex was to the following effect: 1

"1. That the Lady Anne, Queen of England, having been the wife of the king for the space of three years and more, she, the said Lady Anne, contemning the marriage so solemnized between her and the king, and bearing malice in her heart against the king, and following her frail and carnal last, did falsely and traitorously procure, by means of indecent language, gifts, and other acts therein stated, divers of the king's daily and familiar servants to be her adulterers and concubines; so that several of the king's servants, by the said queen's most vile provocation and invitation, became given and inclined to the said queen.

¹ We shall meet him again in Ireland: he was the queen's courin, and man of the very highest character and shillt. The grand jury of Kenl were nominated by Sir Thomas Wyatt, who was sheriff for that year. Thus is not unimportant, for Wyatt in past times had been Anne's intimate friend, if not her lover.

² The indictment found at Depulord was exactly similar; referring to other acts of the same kind, committed by the same persons at Greenwick.

"2. That the queen [on the] 6th of October, 25 Hen. VIII. [1583], at Westminster, by words, &c., procured and incited one Henry Norris, Esq., one of the gentlemen of the king's privy chamber, to have Micit intercourse with her; and that the act was committed at Westminster, 12th October, 25 Hen. VIII.

- "8. That the queen, 2nd of November, 27 Hen. VIII. [1535], by the means therein stated, procured and incited George Boleyn, knight, Lord Rochfort, her own natural brother, to have illicit intercourse with her; and that the act was committed 5th of November in the same year, at Westminster, against the commands of Almighty God, and all laws human and divine.
- 44. That the queen, 3rd December, 25 Hen. VIII., procured and incited William Brereton, Esq., one of the gentlemen of the king's privy chamber, to have illicit intercourse with her; and that the act was committed at Hampton Court, 25th December, 25 Hen. VIII.
- "5. That the queen, 8th of May, 26 Hen. VIII., procured and incited Francis Weston, one of the gentlemen of the king's privy chamber, to have illicit intercourse with her; and that the act was committed at Westminster, 20th May, 26 Hen. VIII.
- " 6. That the queen, 12th of April, 26 Hen. VIII., procured and incited Mark Smeton, Esq., one of the grometers of the king's chamber, to have illicit intercourse with her; and that the act was committed at Westminster, 26th April, 26 Henry VIII.

- "7. Furthermore, that the said George, Lord Roch fort, Henry Norris, Wilkiam Brereton, Sir Francis Weston, and Mark Smeton, being thus inflamed by carnal love of the queen, and having become very jealous of each other, did, in order to secure her aftections, satisfy her inordinate desires; and that the queen was equally jealous of the Lord Rochfort and other the before-mentioned traitors; and sie would not allow them to show any familiarity with any other woman, without her exceeding displeasure and indignation; and that on the 27th day of November, 27 Hen. VIII., and other days, at Westminster, she gave them gifts and great rewards, to inveigle them to her will.
- "8. Furthermore, that the queen, and other the said traitors, jointly and severally, 81st of October, 27 Hen. VIII., and at various times before and after, compassed and imagined the king's death; and that the queen had frequently promised to marry some one of the traitors, whenever the king should depart this life, affirming she never would love the king in her heart.
- "9. Furthermore, that the king, having within a short time before become acquainted with the beforementioned crimes, vices, and treasons, had been so grieved that certain harms and dangers had happened to his royal body." 1

I suppose that persons who have made up their minds conclusively, and are resolved to abide by the popular verdict of English historians, will turn with disgust from these hideous charges; seeming, as they do, to overstep all ordinary bounds of credibility. On one side or the other there was indeed no common

1 Bagu du Secretia, pouch 9.

The colours deepen at every step. But it is to be remembered that if the improbability of The improbcrimes so revolting is becoming greater, the ability of the opposite improbability increases with equal and the life strength — that English noblemen and gentlemen could have made themselves a party her increase in the same to the invention of the story. For invention is unfortunately the only word; would indeed that any other were admissible! The discovery of the indictment disposes at once of Burnet's legend, that the queen was condemned on hearsay evidence; or that her guilt was conjectured from an exaggerated report of foolish conversations. It cuts off all hope, too, of possible mistake. I have heard the name of There is no Leontes mentioned as a parallel to Henry; room for the and if the question lay only between the king of mistake and his wife, we would gladly welcome the alternative. Charity would persuade us that a husband had been madly blind, sooner far than that a queen had been madly wicked. But this road for escape is closed. The mistake of Leontes was transparent to The parallel Anne Boleyn were presented by two grand mission. juries before the highest judicial tribunal in the realm. There was nothing vague, nothing conjectural. detail was given of acts and conversations stretching over a period of two years and more; and either there was evidence for these things, or there was none. If there was evidence, it must have been close, elaborate, and minute; if there was none, these judges, these juries and noblemen, were the accomplices of the king in a murder perhaps the most revolting which was ever committed.

It may be thought that the evidence was pieced together in the secrets of the cabinet; that the juries found their bills on a case presented to them. The difficul-Hes in the by the council. This would transfer the in-WAY OF AUDporting the famy to a higher stage; but if we try to imagine how the council proceeded in such a forgod. business, we shall not find it an easy task. The council, at least, could not have been deceived. The evidence. wratever it was, must have been examined by them: and though we stretch our belief in the complacency of statesmen to the furthest limit of credulity, can we believe that Cromwell would have invented that dark indictment. - Cromwell who was, and who remained till his death, the dearest friend of Latimer? Or the Duke of Norfolk, the veteran who had won his spura at Flodden? Or the Duke of Suffolk and Sir William Fitzwilliam, the Wellington and the Nelson of the sixteenth century? Scarcely among the picked scourdrels of Newgate could men be found for such work; and shall we believe it of men like these? It is to me impossible. Yet, if it was done at all, it was done by those four ministers.

Even if we could believe that they forged the accusations, yet they would at least limit the dimensions of them. The most audacious villain will not extend his crimes beyond what he requires for his object; To what persons the and if the king desired only to rid himself of tion of ofhis wife, to what purpose the multiplication the number of offenders, and the long list of acts of guilt, when a single offence with the one accomplice who was ready to abide by a confession would have suf-The four gentlemen gratuitously, on this hypothesis, entangled in the indictment, were nobly connected: one of them, Lord Rochfort, was himself peer; they had hved, all four, several years at the court, and were personally known to every member of the council. Are we to suppose that evidence was invented with no imaginable purpose, for wanton and needless murders? — that the council racked the success of their scheme, by multiplying charges which only increased difficulty of proof, and provoked the interference of the powerful relations of the accused?

4 Sir Francis Bryan, the queen's equain, was at first suspected. He was absent from the court, and received a message from Cremwell to appear instantly on his allegence. The following extract is from the Deposition of the Abbet of Weburn — MS Critics. Cloopstra, E iv :

"The and abbot remembereth that at the fall of Queen Anne, whom God parties, Master Bryan, holag in the country, was reddenly cout for by the Lord Privy Seel, as the said Master Bryan afterwards showed me. charging hun upon his ollegiance to come to him wheresoever he was within this realist upon the eight of his letter, and to he did with all speed. And at his next report to Ampthill, I same to visit him there, at what time the Lord Grey of Wilton, with many other from of wombin, was with him in the great court at Ampthill aforesaid. And at my coming in at the autor guts. Master Hryun powervad me, and of his much gentlemen come towards meeting me; to whom I asst, ' how welcome home and never so welcome. He, automobied, said unce me, "Why no?" The said abbot and, "Sir, I shall show you that at leasure," and walked up frie the great chamber with the men of worship. And after a pance it pleased from to sit down upon a banch and willed me to sit by him, and after that demanded of me what I great when I said, 'Never so welcome as than;' to whom I said these "Ser, Almighty God in his first creation made an order of tagets, and among all made one principal, which was the -----, who would not be contrast with his outste, but affected the coluitude and rule of Creater, for the which he was divested from the altitude of heaven into the profundity of hell into overlasting darkness, without repair or return, with these that consented unto his pride. So it now lately befull in this our worldly burneray of the court by the fall of Queen Anne as a worldly hassifer, not contest with her estate to be true unto her creater, making has his queen, but affected unlawful concupied sides. All meddenly out of that fals dy wherein the was set, irrecoverably with all those that consented anto har lust, whereof I am glad that we were never; and therefore, new welcome and never so welcome, here is the end of my tale." And then he said unto man "Sir, indeed, as you say, I was suddenly sent for, marvel. Hag thereof and debating the mot or in my mind why this should buy at the hat I considered and knew myself true and clear in conscience unto my primes, and with all speed and without fear (heatily out) me forward and same to my Lord Privy Seel, and after that to the King's Grees, and noth ing found in me, not never shall be, but just and true to my master the King's Grace." And then I said ' Benedicted, but this was a marve Som-

Such are the difficulties in which, at this early stage of the transaction, we are already implicated. They will not diminish as we proceed.

Friday, the 12th of May, was fixed for the opening of the court. On that day, a petty jury was Priday, May 12. returned at Westminster, for the trial of Sir The court PORM. Henry Norris, Sir Francis Weston, Sir William Brereton, and Mark Smeton. The commission sat. - the Earl of Wiltshire sitting with them,1 - and the four prisoners were brought to the bar. On The four OGENIZACIO DI CENTRALIZA their arraignment, Mark Smeton, we are told, are brought be the bar. pleaded guilty of adultery with the queen; not guilty of the other charges. Norris, Weston, and Brereton severally pleaded not guilty. Ver-Best states, dict, guilty. The king's sergeant and attorney pray judgment. Judgment upon Smeton, Norria, Weston, and Brereton as usual in cases of high treason. This is all which the record contains. The nature of the evidence is not mentioned. But again there was a jury; and if we have not the evidence which convinced that jury, we have the evidence that they were, or professed to be, convinced.

The queen and her brother were to be tried on the following Monday. Their crime was not adultery only, but was coloured with the deeper stain of incest. On the Friday, while the other prisoners were at the bar, peremptory commandment,' said I, 'and would have astonished the wises' man in this realm.' And he said,' What then, he must needs do his master's commandment, and I assure you there never was a man wise to order the king's causes than he in; I pray God save he life.'

The language both of Sir Francis Bryan and the abbot is irreconcileable with any other supposition, except that they at least were estaded of the queen's guilt.

. Bags de Secretis, pouch S. The discovery of these papers sets at rest the controversy whether the Earl of Wiltshire took part in the trial. He was absent at the trial of his children; he was present at the trial of the other prisoners.

477

"Letters patent were addressed to Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, Treasurer and Earl Marshal of England, setting forth that the Lady Anne. Queen of England, and Sir George Boleyn, knight, Lord Rochfort, had been indicted of certain capital crimes; and that the king, considering that justice was a most excellent virtue. and pleasing to the Most Highest; and inasmuch as the office of High Steward of England, whose presence for the administration of the law in this case The Pote of Horotek is is required, was vacant, the king therefore and local appointed the said duke Lord High Steward and Blow of England, with full powers to receive the indictments found against Queen Anne and the Lord Rochfort, and calling them before him, for the purpose of hearing and examining them, and compelling them to answer The duke was to collect also " such and so many lords, peers, and magnates of the kingdom of England, peers of the said Queen Anne and Lord Rochfort, by whom the truth could be better known; and the truth being known, to give judgment accordmg to the laws and customs of England, and to give sentence and judgment, and to direct execution, with the other usual powers." As a certain number only of the peers were summoned, it may be imagined that some fraud was practised in the selection, and that those only were admitted whose subserviency could be relied upon. I will therefore give the names as before

The two English Dukes, of Norfolk and Suffolk. The one English Marquis, of Exeter. The List of new limits of early of Arundel, Oxford, Northumberland to by the three queens early lover), Westmoreland, her brother Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Sussex, and Huntingdon all the earls in the peerage except four—those of Shrewsbury, Essex, Cumberland, and Wiltshire. Why the first three were omitted I do not know. Lord Wiltshire had already fulfilled his share of the miserable duty; he was not compelled to play the part of Brutus, and condemn, in person, his two children. The remaining peers were the Lords Andeley, De la Wate, Montague, Morley, Dacre, Cobham, Maltravers, Powis, Mounteagle, Clinton, Sandys, Windsor, Wentworth, Burgh, and Mordaunt: twenty-seven in all: men hitherto of unblemished honour—the noblest blood in the realm.

² Baga de Secretra, pouch 2.

The Duke of Richmond was under age.

Monday, May 16. Account of the trist in the Bage de Recrotts. These noblemen assembled in the Tower on the 15th of May. The queen was brought before them; and the record in the Baga de Secretis relates the proceeding as follows:—

"Before the Lord High Steward at the Tower, Anne, Queen of England, comes in the custody of Sir William Kingston, Constable of the Tower, and is brought to the bar. Being arraigned of the beforementioned treasons, she pleads not guilty, and puts herself upon her peers; whereupon the Duke of Suffolk, Marquis of Exeter, and others the before-mentioned earls and barons, peers of the said queen, being charged by the said Lord High Steward to say the truth, and afterwards being examined severally by the Lord High Steward, from the lowest peer to the highest, each of them severally saith that she is guilty.

The queen is Constable back to the king's prison within the Tower; and then, as the king shall commend to be be belowed at the king's Tower, and there burned or beheaded, as shall please the king."

h Baga de Secrette, percel $.

Google

Onglia from PENN STATE

In such cold lines is the story of this tragedy unrolling itself to its close. The course which it followed, however, was less hard in the actual life; and men's hearts, even in those stern times, could beat with human emotions. The Duke of Norfolk was in tears as he passed sentence.\footnote{1} The Earl of Northumberland\footnote{2} was obliged by a sudden illness to leave the court.\footnote{2} The sight of the woman whom he had once loved, and to whom he was perhaps married, in that dreadful position, had been more than he could bear; and the remainder of the work of the day went forward without him.

The queen withdrew. Her brother took his place at the bar. Like Anne, be declared himself took norn innocent. Like Anne, he was found guilty, guilty also and sentenced to die.

1 Constantyna, Archeologia, Val. XXIII. p. 68.

* Baga de Socreta. When the Pilgrimage of Orace broke out four months later, Northumberland was the only nobleman in the power of the insurgests who refused to join in the rebellion. They three-sened to kill him; but "at that and all times the earl was vary accused against the commons in the hing's behalf and the Lord Privy Scal's." — Confession of William Stapleton: Rolls House MS. A. 2, 2. See Vol. 111 of this word chap, mil.

I know not whether I should here add the details which Meteren gives of these trials. His authority, a Flemish gentleman, was in London at the time, but was not present in the court. The Lord of Bitherve (that was this gentlemen's name) was persuaded that the queen was unjustly accused, and he worked out of the rumours which he heard an interesting picture. touched with natural sympathy. It has been often repeated, however. If may be read elsewhere, and as an authority it is but of faint importance If we allow it its fallost weight, it proves that a foreigner then in England believed the queen innocent, and that she defended herself with an ale quence which deeply touched her hearen. His further assertion, that "Smeton's confession was all which was alleged " against her, is certainly basecurate; and his complaint, which has been so often echoed, of the absence of witnesses, implies only a want of knowledge of the forms which were observed in trials for high treason. The witnesses were not brought into court and confunted with the prisoners their depositions were taken on onth before the grand juries and the privy council, and on the tdal were read out for the secured to answer as they could.

We can form no estimate of the evidence; for we do not know what it was. We cannot especially accuse the form of the trial; for it was the form which was always observed. But the fact remains to us, that these twenty-seven peers, who were not ignorant, as we are, but were fully acquainted with the grounds of the prosecution, did deliberately, after hearing the queen's defence, pronounce against her a unanimous verdict. If there was foul play, they had advantages infinitely greater than any to which we can pretend for detecting it. The Holeyns were unpopular, and Anne herself was obnoxious to the imperialists and Catholics; but all parties. Catholic and Protestant alike, united in the sentence.

Looking at the case, then, as it now stands, we have the report for some time current, that the queen was out of favour, and that the king's affection was turned in another direction. - a report, be it observed, which had arisen before the catastrophe, and was not, therefore, an afterthought, or legend; we have also the antecedent improbability, which is very great, that a lady in the queen's position could have been guilty of the offences with which the indictment charges her. We have also the improbability, which is great, that the king, now forty-four years old, who in his earlier years had been distinguished for the absence of those vices in which contemporary princes indulged themselves, in wanton weariness of a woman for whom he had revolutionized the kingdom, and quarrelled with half Christendom, suddenly resolved to murder her; that, instead of resorting to poison, or to the less obtrusive methods of criminality, he invented, and persuaded his council to assist hum in inventing, a series of accusations which reflected dishonour on himself, and which involved the gratuitous death of five persons with whom be had no quarrel, who were attached to his court and person. To maintain these accusations, he would have to overawe into an active participation in his crime, indges, juries, peers, the dearest relations of those whom he was destroying, and this with no standing army, no pratorians or janissaries at his back, with no force but the yeomen of the guard, who could be scattered by a rising of the apprentices. He had gone out of his way, moreover, to call a parliament; and the nummons had been so hasty that no time was left to control the elections; while again to fail was ruin; and the generation of Englishmen to whom we owe the Reformation were not so wholly lost to all principles of honour, The popular that Henry could have counted beforehand then be not upon success in so desperate a scheme with eredible. that absolute certainty without which he would scarcely have risked the experiment. I think that there is some improbability here. Unlikely as it is that queens should disgrace themselves, history contains unfortunately more than one instance that it is not impossible. That queens in that very age were capable of profligacy was proved, but a few years later, by the confessions of Catherine Howard. I believe history will be ransacked vainly to find a parallel for conduct at once so dastardly, ac audacious, and so foolishly wicked as that which the popular hypothesis attributes to Henry VIII.

This is a fair statement of the probabilities; not, I believe, exaggerated on either side. Turning to the positive facts which are known to us, we have the total amongst those which make for the queen her queen own denial of her guilt; her supposed letter to the king, which wears the complexion of innocence; the assertions of three out of the five other persons who were accused, up to the moment of their execution; and the sympathizing story of a Flemish gentleman who believed her innocent, and who says that many other people in England believed the same. On the other side, we have the judicial verdict of more than seventy noblemen and gentlemen,1 no one of whom had any interest in the deaths of the accused, and some of whom had interests the most tender in their The light agalast but acquittal; we have the assent of the judges who sat on the commission, and who passed sentence. after full opportunities of examination, with all the evidence before their eyes; toe partial confession of one of the prisoners, though afterwards withdrawn; and the complete confession of another, maintained till the end, and not withdrawn upon the scaffold. Mr. Hallam must pardon me for saying that this is not a matter in which doubt is unpermitted.

A brief interval only was allowed between the judgwednesday, ment and the final close. On Wednesday, his 17
The areas the 17th, the five gentlemen were taken to sentlemen execution. Smeton was hanged; the others were beheaded. Smeton and Brereton acknowledged the justice of their sentence. Brereton said that if he had to die a thousand deaths, he deserved them all;
and Brereton was the only one of the five whose guilt at the time was doubted. Norris died silent; Weston, with a few general lamentations on the wickedness of his past life. None denied the crime for which they

I Two grand juries, the petty jury, and the twenty-seven peers.

^{*} Constantyne's Memor., Archael., Vol. XXIII. pp. 68-66. Constantyne was an attendant of Sir Henry Norris at this time, and a friend and school-fellow of Sir W. Brereton. He was a resolute Protestant, and be says that at first he and all other friends of the geopel were unable to believe that the queen had behaved so about aably "As I may be saved before God," he says, "I could not believe it, afore I heard them speak at their death." But on the scaffold, he adds, "In a manner all on based but Mr. Notrie, who said almost nothing at all."

suffered; all but one were considered by the spectators to have confessed. Rochfort had shown some feeling while in the Tower. Kingston on one occasion found him weeping bitterly. The day of the trial he sent a petition to the king, to what effect I do not learn; and on the Tuesday he begged to see Cromwell, having something on his conscience, as he said, which he wished to tell him. His desire, however, does not seem to have been complied with; he spoke sorrowfully on the scaffold of the shame which he had brought upon the gospel, and died with words which appeared to the spectators, if not a confession, yet something very nearly resembling it. "This said lord," wrote a spectator to the court at Brussels, "made a good Catholic address to the people. He said that he had not come there to preach to them, but rather to serve as a mirror and an example. He acknowledged the crimes which he had committed against God, and against the king his sovereign; there was no occasion for him, he said, to repeat the cause for which he was condemned; they would have little pleasure in hearing him tell it. He prayed God, and he prayed the king, to pardon his offences; and all others whom he might have injured he also prayed to forgive him as heartily as he forgave every one. He bade his hearers avoid the vanities of the world, and the flatteries of the court which had brought him to the shameful end which had overtaken him. Had he obeyed the lessons of that gospel which he had so often read, he said he should not have fallen so far; it was worth more to be a good door than a good reader. Finally, he forgave those who had adjudged him to die, and he desired them to pray God for his soul." 1

The Pilgrim: Appen£x, p. 116.

Mingston to Commell: Singer, p. 440.

The queen was left till a further mystery had per-Proper Policy plexed yet deeper the disgraceful exposure.

The Henry had desired Company of the proper than the desired Company of the property of the propert Henry had desired Cranmer to be her conthat she has The archbishop was with her on the auvez boom day after her trial, and she then made an ex-BIRTHOU SO traordinary avowal,2 either that she had been the hingmarried or contracted in early life, or had been entangled in some connexion which invalidated her marriage with the king. The letter to the emperer, which I have already quoted,8 furnishes the solitary explanation of the mystery which remains. Some one, apparently the imperial ambassador, informed Charles that she was discovered to have been nine years before married to Lord Percy, not formally only, but really and completely. If this be true, her fate need scarcely excite further sympathy.

On Wednesday she was taken to Lambeth, where she made her confession in form, and the archbishop, sitting judicially, pronounced her marriage with the king to have been null and void. The supposition, that this business was a freak of caprice or passion, is too puerile to be considered. It is certain that she acknowledged something; and it is certain also that Lord Northumberland was examined upon the subject before the archbishop. In person upon oath indeed, and also in a letter to Cromwell, Northumberland denied that he had ever been legally connected with her; but perhaps Northumberland was afraid to make an admission to dangerous to himself, or perhaps the confession itself was a vague effort which she made to save her life. But whatever she said, and whether she spoke truth or falsehood, she was pronounced divorced, the ground and the divorce did not save her. Friday, around the 19th, was fixed for her death; and when she found that there was no hope she recovered her spirits. The last scene was to be on the green inside the Tower. The public were to be admitted; but Kingston suggested that to avoid a crowd it was desirable not to fix the hour, since it was supposed that she would make no further confession.

¹ Kingston to Cromwell; and see Constantyne's Memorical.

^{1 &}quot; Now of late, God, of his infinite goodness, from whom no secret things can be hid, bath caused to be brought to light, evident and open knowledge of certain just, true, and lawful imped ments, unknown at the making of the said acts [by which the marriage had been declared legitimate] and since that time confessed by the Lady Anne, by the which it plainly appearant that the said marriage was never good nor consonant to the laws." — 28 Henry VIII. cap. 7. See also the appendix to the fourth volume of this work.

Vol. 1 pp. 175, 176.

"This morning she sent for me," he added, "that I might be with her at such time as she re-Thursday, Lay 18. ceived the good Lord, to the intent that I ringularly should hear her speak as touching her inno-her conduct cency always to be clear. 'Mr. Kingston,' Tour. she said, 'I hear say I shall not die afore noon, and I am very sorry therefore, for I thought to be dead by this time, and past my pain.' I told her it should be no pain, it was so subtle; and then she said, 'I heard say the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck,' and put her hands about it, laughing heartily. I have seen many men, and also women, executed, and they have been in great sorrow; and to my knowledge, this lady hath much joy and pleasure in death." "

² On the day on which she first saw the archbishop, she said, at winner that she expected to be spared, and that she would retire to Antwerp. – Kingston to Cromwell: Singer, p. 460.

Burnet mises a dilemma here. If, he says, the queen was not n arrial to the king, there was no adultary; and the sentence of death and the sentence of divorce mutually neutralize each other. It is possible that in the general horror at so complicated a desinquency, the technical defence was averlooked.

Kingston to Cromwell: Singer, p. 461.

A little before moon on the 19th of May,

Anne Boleyn, Queen of England, was led down to the green. A single cannon stood loaded on the battlements; the motionless cannoneer was ready, with smoking linstock, to tell London that all was over. The yeomen of the guard were there, and a crowd of citizens; the lord mayor in his robes, the deputies of the guilds, the sheriffs, and the aldermen; they were come to see a spectacle which England had never seen before — a head which had worn the crown falling under the sword of an executioner.

On the scaffold, by the king's desire, there were the partial, present Cromwell, the Lord Chancellor, the body the partial Duke of Suffolk, and lastly, the Duke of Richappen to mond, who might now, when both his sisters were illegitimized, be considered heir presumptive to the throne. As in the choice of the commission, as in the conduct of the trial, as in the summons of parliament, as in every detail through which the cause was passed, Henry had shown outwardly but one desire to do all which the most strict equity prescribed, so around this last scene he had placed those who were nearest in blood to himself, and nearest in rank to the crown. If she who was to suffer was falling under a forged charge, he acted his part with horrible completeness.

The queen appeared walking feebly, supported by the Lieutenant of the Tower. She seemed half stupified, and looked back from time to time at the ladies by whom she was followed. On reaching the platform, she asked if she might say a few words; 1 and permission being granted, she turned to the spectators and said: "Christian people, I am come to die. And according to law, and by law, I am judged to death; and therefore I will speak nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speak anything of that whereof I am accused and condemned to die. But I pray God save the king, and send him long to reign over you; for a gentler and more merciful prince was there never; and to me he was ever a good, a gentle, and sovereign lord. If any person will meddle of my cause, I require him to judge the best. And thus I take my leave of the world and of you; and I heartily desire you all to pray for me. Oh, Lord, have mercy on me. To God I commend my soul." 1 "These words," says Stow, " she spoke with a smiling countenance." an ermine cloak which was then taken off. self removed her headdress, and one of her attendants gave her a cap into which she gathered her hair. She then knelt, and breatning faintly a commendation of her soul to Christ, the executioner with a single blow struck off her head. A white handkerchief was thrown over it as it fell, and one of the ladies took it up and carried it away. The other women lifted the body and bore it into the Chapel of the Tower, where it was buried in the choir.2

1 Letter of --- to --- . The Pilgram, p. 116.

Thus she too died without denying the crime for which she suffered. Smeton confessed from the first. Brereton, Weston, Rochfort, virtually confessed on the scaffold. Norris said nothing. Of all the sufferers not one ventured to declare that he or she was innocent, — and that six human beings should leave the world with the undeserved stain of so believe a charge on them, without attempting to clear themselves, is credible only to those who form opinions by their wills, and believe or disbelieve as they choose.

Pügrim, p. 116.

¹ Wysti's Messoirs, Hall, Stow, Constant no's Messorial. There is some it warriation in the different accounts, but some of importance.

To this end the queen had come at last, and silence is the best comment which charity has to offer upon it. Better far it would have been if the dust had been blowed to settle down over the grave of Anne Boleyn, and her remembrance buried in forgetfulness. Strange it is that a spot which ought to have been sacred to pity, should have been made the arena for the blind wrestling of controversial duellists. Blind, I call it; for there has been little clearness of judgment, little even of common prudence in the choice of sides. If the Catholics could have fastened the stain of murder on the king and the statesmen of England, they would have struck the faith of the establishment a harder blow than by a poor tale of scandal against a weak, erring, suffering woman: and the Protestante, in mistaken generosity, have courted an infamy for the names of those to whom they owe their being, which, staining the fountain, must stain for ever the stream which flows from it. It has been no pleasure to rue to rake among the evil memories of the past, to prove a human being sinful whom the world has ruled to have been innocent. Let the blame rest with those who have forced upon our history the alternative of a reassertion of the truth, or the shame of noble names which have not deserved it at our hands.

No sooner had the result of the trial appeared to be certain, than the prospects of the succession to the throne were seen to be more perplexed than ever. The prince so earnestly longed for had not been born. The disgrace of Anne Boleyn, even before her last confession, strengthened the friends of the Princess Mary. Elizabeth, the child of a doubtful marriage which had terminated in adultery and incest, would have had slight chance of being maintained, even if her birth had suffered no further stain; and by the Lambeth sentence she was literally and le- Bimbeth gally illegitimate. The King of Scotland mote. was now the nearest heir; and next to him stood Lady Margaret Douglas, his sister, who had been born in England, and was therefore looked upon with better favour by the people. As if to make confusion worse confounded, in the midst of the uncertainty Lord Thomas Howard, taking advantage of the Lort Thomas moment, and, as the act of his attainder Lady Hassays,1 "being seduced by the devil, and not booker. having the fear of God before his eyes," persuaded this lady into a contract of marriage with him; " The presumption being," says the same act, "that he aspired to the crown by reason of so high a marriage; or, at least, to the making division for the same: having a firm hope and trust that the subjects of this realm 2 would incline and bear affection to the said Lady Margaret, being born in this realm; and not to the King of Scots, her brother, to whom this realm hath not, nor ever had, any affection; but would resist his attempt to the crown of this realm to the uttermost of their possers." ?

Before the discovery of this proceeding, but in anticipation of inevitable intrigues of the kind, the privy council and the peers, on the same grounds which had before led them to favour the divorce from Catherine, petitioned the king to save the country from the perils which menaced it, and to take a fresh wife with the count out an hour's delay. Heary's experience of the total the point matrimony had been so discouraging, that to an instant they feared he might be refuctant to venture upon it again. Nevertheless, for his country's take, they trusted that he would not refuse.1

^{1 28} Hea. VIII. cap. 24.

² This paragraph is of great importance, it throws a light on many A west peoplexing passages in this and the succeeding reigns.

^{* 26} Hen. VIII. cap. 24

Henry, professedly in obedience to this request, was married, immediately after the execution, Jene Serto Jane, daughter of Sir John Seymour. mour. The indecent haste is usually considered a proof entirely conclusive of the cause of Anne Boleyn's ruin.3 Under any aspect it was an extraordinary step, which requires to be gravely considered. Henry, who waited seven years for Anne Boleyn, to whom he was violently attached, was not without control over his passions; and if appetite had been the moving influonce with him, he would scarcely, with the eyes of all the world upon him, have passed so extravagant an insult upon the nation of which he was the sovereign. If Jane Seymour had really been the object of a pre-

I Speech of the Lord Chancellor: Lords Journals, p. 84. Statistics of the Realm; 28 Henry VIII. cap. 7. Similarly, on the death of Jane Seymour, the council toged immediate re-marriage on the king, considering a single prince an insufficient occurity for the fature. In a letter of Cromwell's to the English embaseador at Paris, on the day of Jane Seymour's coath, there is the following passage:

"And foresmuch as, though his Majesty is not enything disposed to marry again — albeit his Highness, God be thanked, taketh this chance as a man that by reason with force overcometh his effections may take unde an extreme advanture — yet as sundry of his Grace's council here have the ight it meet for us to be most humble sultons to his Majesty to consider the state of his realm, and to enter afterous into another matrimosy; so his tender seal to us his ambjects both already so much overcize alle Grace's said imposition and framed his mind both to be indifferent to the thing and to the election of any person from any part that, with deliberation, shall be thought meet for him, that we live in hope that his Grace will again couple himself to our consorts." — Beate Popers, Vol. VIII. p. 1

Burnet, Hume, Strickland, &c. There is an absolute consenses of no therities.

vious unlawful attachment, her conduct in accepting so instantly a position so frightfully made vacant, can scarcely be painted in too revolting colours. Yet Jane Seymour's name, at home and abroad, by Catholic and Protestant, was alke honoured and respected. Among all Henry's wives she stands out distinguished by a stainless name, untarnished with the breath of reproach.

If we could conceive the English nation so tonguetied that they dared not whisper their feelings, there were Brussels, Paris, Rome, where the truth could be told; yet, with the exception of a single passage in a letter of Mary of Hungary, there is no hint in the correspondence, either in Paris, Simancas, or Brussels, that there was a suspicion of foul play. If Charles or Francia had believed Henry really capable of so deep atrocity, no political temptation would have induced either of them to commit their cousins or nieces to the embrace of a monster, yet no sooner was Jane Seymour dead, than we shall find them competing eagerly with each other to secure his hand.

It is quite possible that when Anne Boleyn was growing licentious, the king may have distinguished a lady of acknowledged excellence by some in no way

"The king has, I understand, already married another woman, who, they say, is a good Imperialist. I know not whether she will so continue. As had shown an inclination for her before the other's death; and as neither that other herself, nor any of the rest who were put to death, confensed their guilt, except one who was a musician, some people think he invented the charge to get rid of her. However it be, no great wrong can I ave been done to the woman herself. She is known to have been a worthless person It has been her character for a long time.

"I suppose, if one may speak so lightly of each things, that when he is tired of his new wife he will find some occasion to quit himself of her also. Our sex will not be too well enturied if these practices come into vogue; and, though I have no fancy to expose myself to danger, yet, being a woman, I will pray with the rest that God will have morey on us." — The Pilgrim, p. 117.

improper preference, and that when desired by the council to choose a wife immediately, he should have taken a person as unlike as possible to the one who had disgraced him. This was the interpretation which was given to his conduct by the Lords and Commons of England. In the absence of any evidence, or shadow of evidence, that among contemporaries who had means of knowing the truth, another judgment was passed upon it, the deliberate assertion of an act of parliament must be considered a safer guide than modern unsupported conjecture.¹

This matter having been accomplished, the king reJune ! turned to London to meet parliament. The Parliament Houses assembled on the 8th of June; the peers had hastened up in unusual numbers, as if sensible of the greatness of the occasion. The Commons were untried and unknown; and if Anne Boleyn was an innocent victim, no king of England was ever in so terrible a position as Henry VIII when he entered the Great Chamber fresh from his new bridal. He took his seat upon the throne; and then Audeley, the Lord Chancellor, rose and spoke: **

At the dissolution of the late parliament, the King's Highness had not thought so soon to meet you here again. He has called you together now, being moved thereunto by causes of grave moment, affecting both his own person and the interests of the commonwealth. You will have again to consider the succession to the

I Lords Journals, p. 84.

Within four months the northern counties were in arms. Castle and sottage and village pulpit rang with outcrise against the government. Yet, as the countless reports of the complaints of the insurgents, there is no hint of a suspicion of foul play in the late tragedy. If the criminality of the king a self-evident to us, how could it have been less than evident to Asks and Lerd Darcy?

erown of this realm. His Highness knows himself to be but mortal, liable to fall sick, and to die.¹ At present he perceives the peace and welfare of the kingdom to depend upon his single life; and he is anxious to leave it, at his death, free from peril. He desires you therefore to nominate some person as his heir apparent, who, should it so befall him (which desires the parliament God forbid!) to depart out of this world with-helr apparent children lawfully begotten, may rule in peace over this land, with the consent and the good will of the inhabitants thereof.

"You will also deliberate upon the repeal of a certain act passed in the late parliament, by which the realm is bound to obedience to the Lady Anne Boleyn, late wife of the king, and the heirs lawfully begotten of them twain, and which declares all persons who shall, by word or deed, have offended against this lady or her offspring, to have incurred the penalties of treason.

"These are the causes for which you are assembled; and if you will be advised by me, you will act the load in these matters according to the words of Chancellor's Solomon, with whom our most gracious king may deservedly be compared. The "wise man" counsels us to bear in mind such things as be past, to weigh well such things as be present, and provide prudently for the things which be to come. And you I would bid to remember, first, those sorrows and those burdens which the King's Highness did endure on the occasion of his first unlawful marriage—a marriage not only judged unlawful by the most famous universities in Christendom, but so determined by the consent of this realm; and to remember further the great perils which have threatened his most royal Majesty from the time when he entered on his second marriage.

¹ He had been very ill.

"Then, turning to the present, you will consider in what state the realm now standeth with respect to the cath by which we be bound to the Lady Anne and to her offspring; the which Lady Anne, with her accomplices, has been found guilty of high treason, and has met the due reward of her conspiracies. you will ask yourselves, what man of common The grailcondition would not have been deterred by the king for his third ad-resture sate such calamities from venturing a third time into the state of matrimony. Nevertheless, our most excellent prince, not in any carnal concupiscence, but at the humble entreaty of his nobility, hath consented once more to accept that condition, and has taken to himself a wife who in age and form is deemed to be meet and apt for the procreation of children.

"Lastly, according to the third injunction, let us now do our part in providing for things to come. According to the desire of his most gracious Highness, let us name some person to be his heir; who, in case (quod absit) that he depart this life leaving no offspring lawfully begotten, may be our lawful sovereign. But let us pray Almighty God that He will graciously not leave our prince thus childless; and let us give Him thanks for that He hath preserved his Highness to us out of so many dangers; seeing that his Grace's care and efforts be directed only to the ruling his subjects in peace and charity so long as his life endures, and to the leaving us, when he shall come to die, in sure possession of these blessings."

Three weeks after Anne Boleyn's death and the king's third marriage, the chancellor dared to address the English legislature in these terms: and either he spoke like a reasonable man, which he may have done, or else he was making an exhibition of effrontery to be paralleled only by Seneca's letter to the Roman Senate after the murder of Agrippina. The legislature adopted the first interpretation, and the similar heads of the speech were embodied in an act of parliament. While the statute was in preparation, they made use of the interval in continuing the business of the Reformation. They abolished finally the protection of sanctuary in cases of felony, extending the new provisions even to persons in holy orders: 1 they calmed the alarms of Cranmer and the Protestants by reasserting the extinction of the authority of the pope; and they passed various other laws of economic and social moment. At length, on the 1st of July, in a crowded house, composed of fourteen bishops, 3 211, 1 eighteen abbots, and thirty-nine lay peers, a of the today bill was read a first time of such importance the realm. that I must quote at length its own most noticeable words.

The preamble commenced with reciting those provisions of the late acts which were no longer second great to remain in force. It then proceeded, in the form of an address to the king, to adopt and endorse the divorce and the execution. "Albeit," it ran, "most dread Sovereign Lord, that these acts were made, as it was then thought, upon a pure, perfect, and clear foundation; your Majesty's nobles and commons, thinking the said marriage then had between your Highness and the Lady Anne in their consciences to have been pure, sincere, perfect, and good, and so was reputed and taken in the realm;

^{2 #} Hen. YIII. cap. J.

Including Latimer and Cranmer.

Ibid. cap. 10.

⁴ Lorde Tournale.

[yet] now of late God, of his infinite goodness, from whom no secret things can be hid, hath caused to be brought to light evident and open knowledge of certain just, true, and lawful impediments, unknown at the making of the said acts; and since that time confessed by the Lady Anne, before the Most Reverend Father in God, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, sitting judicially for the same; by the which it plainly appear eth that the said marriage was never good, nor consonant to the laws, but utterly void and of none effect; by reason whereof your Highness was and is lawfully divorced from the bonds of the said marriage in the life of the said Lady Anne:

" And over this, most dread Lord, albeit that your Majesty, not knowing of any lawful impediments, entered into the bonds of the said unlawful marriage, and advanced the same Lady Anne to the honour of the sovereign estate of the queen of this realm; yet she, nevertheless, inflamed with pride and carnal desires of her body, putting apart the dread of God and excellent pencfits received of your Highness, confederated herself with George Boleyn, late Lord Rochfort, her natural brother, Henry Norris, Esq., Francis Weston, Esq., William Brereton, Esq., gentlemen of your privy chamber, and Mark Smeton, groom of your said privy chamber; and so being confederate, she and they most traitorously committed and perpetrated divers detestable and abominable treasons, to the fearful peril and danger of your royal person, and to the utter loss, disherison, and desolation of this realm, if God of his goodness had not in due time brought their said treasons to light; for the which, being plainly and manifestly proved, they were convict and attainted by due course and order of your common law of this realm, and have suffered according to the merits: "

In consequence of these treasons, and to lend, if possible, further weight to the sentence against The late her, the late queen was declared attainted by classed attainted by classed attainted by the common law. The Act then proceeded:

"And forasmuch, most gracious Sovereign, as it hath pleased your royal Majesty — (notwith-standing the great intolerable perils and occasions which your Highness hath suffered and murisge. sustained, as well by occasion of your first unlawful marriage, as by occasion of your second); at the most humble petition and intercession of us your nobles of this realm, for the ardent love and fervent affection which your Highness beareth to the conservation of the peace and amity of the same, and of the good and quiet governance thereof, of your most excellent goodness to enter into marriage again; and [forasmuch as you] have chosen and taken a right noble, virtuous, and excellent lady, Queen Jane, to your true and lawful wife; who, for her convenient years, excellent beauty, and pureness of flesh and blood, is apt to conceive issue by your Highness; which marriage is so pure and sincere, without spot, doubt, or impediment, that the issue presented under the same, when it shall please Almighty God to send it, cannot be truly, lawfully, nor justly interrupted or disturbed of the right and title in the succession of your crown: May it now please your Majesty, for the extinguishment of all doubts, and for the pure and perfect unity of as your subjects, and all our posterities, that inasmuch as the marriage with the Lady Catherine having been invalid, the issue of that marriage is therefore illegitimate; and the marriage with the Lady Anne Boleyn having been upon true and just causes deemed of no value nor effect, the issue YOL, II.

of this marriage is also illegitimate; the succession to the throne be now therefore determined to the issue of the marriage with Queen Jane." I

Thus was every step which had been taken in this great matter deliberately sanctioned by par-The paccessido deterliament. The criminality of the queen was mined to the le ae of the considered to have been proved; the sen king by tence upon her to have been just. The king was thanked in the name of the nation for having made haste with the marriage which has been regarded as the temptation to his crime. It is wholly impossible to dismiss facts like these with a few contemptuous A remon to phrases; and when I remember that the purity of Elizabeth is an open question among the popular our historians, although the foulest kennels must be swept to find the filth with which to defile it; while Anne Boleyn is ruled to have been a saint, notwithstanding the solemn verdict of the Lords and Commons, the clergy, the council, judges, and juries, pronounced against her, - I feel that with such a judgment caprice has had more to do than a just appreciation of evidence.

The parliament had not yet, however, completed the contingency to be provided for, chancellor had said, that the last marriage marriage might prove unfruitful, and this contingency was still unprovided for. The king had desired the Lords and Commons to name his successor; they replied with an act which showed the highest confidence in his patriotism; they conferred a privilege upon him unknown to the constitution, yet a power ²⁸ Hen. VIII. cap. 7. The three last paragraphs, I need scarcely may, are a very brief epitome of very copious language.

The archbishop's sentence of divorce was at the same time submitted to Convolution and approved by it.

which, if honestly exercised, offered by far the happiest solution of the difficulty.

Henry had three children. The Duke of Richmond was illegitimate in the strictest sense, but he had been bred as a prince; and I have shown that, in default of a legitimate heir, the king had thought of him as his possible successor. Mary and Elizabeth were illegitimate also, according to law and form; but the illegitimacy of neither the one nor the other could be pressed to its literal consequences. They were the children. each of them, of connexions which were held legal at the period of their birth. They had each received the rank of a princess; and the instincts of justice demanded that they should be allowed a place in the line of inheritance. Yet, while this feeling was distinctly entertained, it was difficult to give effect to it by statute, without a further complication of questions already too complicated, and without provoking intrigue and jealousy in other quarters. The Princess Mary also had not yet receded from the deflant attitude which she had assumed. She had lent herself to conspiracy, she had broken her allegiance, and had as yet made no submission. To her no favour could be shown while she remained in this position; and it was equally undesirable to give Elizabeth, under the altered circumstances, a permanent preference to her uster.

The parliament, therefore, with as much boldness as good sense, cut the knot, by granting Henry the parliament grant the power to bequeath the crown by will. He the king a power to be could thus advance the Duke of Richmond, and the crown by will. It is king a power to be crown by will. It is king a power to be crown by will. It is king a power to be crown by will. It is king a power to be crown by will. It is king a power to be crown by will.

of confidence, as honourable to the country as to the king; and if we may believe, as the records say, that the tragedy of the past month had indeed grieved and saddened Henry, the generous larguage in which the legislature committed the future of the nation into his bands, may have something soothed his wounds.

" Forasmuch as it standeth," they said, " in the only pleasure and will of Almighty God, whether your Majesty shall have heirs begotten and procreated from this (late) marriage, or else any lawful heirs or issues hereafter of your own body, begotten by any other lawful wife; and if such heirs should fail (as God defend), and no provision be made in your life who should rule and govern this realm, then this realm, after your transitory life, shall be destitute of a governor, or else percase [be] encumbered with a person that would count to aspire to the same, whom the subjects of this realm shall not find in their hearts to love, dread, and obediently serve 1 as their sovereign lord; and if your Grace, before it be certainly known whether ye shall have heirs or not, should suddenly name and declare any person or persons to succeed after your decease, then it is to be doubted that such person so named might happen to take great heart and courage, and by presumption fall to inobedience and rebellion all the massure by occasion of which premises, divisions and presumption fall to inobedience and rebellion . dissensions are likely to arise and spring in this realm, to the great peril and destruction of us, your most humble and obedient servants, and all our posterities: For reformation and remedy hereof, we, your most bounden and loving subjects, most obediently acknowledging that your Majesty, prudently, victoriously.

1 The King of Scoter 28 Hen. VIII. c. 24.

politicly, and indifferently, bath maintained this realm in peace and quietness during all the time of your most gracious reign, putting our trust and confidence in your Highness, and nothing doubting but that your Majesty, if you should fail of heirs lawfully begotten, for the love and affection that we bear to this realm, and for avoiding all the occasions of divisions after rehearsed, so earnestly mindeth the wealth of the same, that ye can best and most prudently provide such a governour for us and this your realm, as will succeed and follow in the just and right tract of all your proceedings, and maintain, keep, and defend the same and all the laws and ordinances established in your Grace's time for the wealth of the realm, which we all desire, do therefore most humbly beseech your Highness, that it may be enacted, for avoiding all ambiguities, doubts, and divisions, that your Highness shall have full and plenary power and authority to dispose, by your letters patent under your great seal, or else by your last will made in writing, and signed with your hand, the nuperial crown of this realm, and all other the premises thereunto belonging, to such person or persons as shall please your Highness.

"And we, your humble and obedient subjects, do Saithfully promise to your Majesty, by one common assent, that after your decease, we, our heirs and successors, shall accept and take, love, dread, and only obey such person or persons, male or female, as your Majesty shall give your imperial crown unto; and wholly to stick to them as true and faithful subjects ought to lo." 1

1 29 Hea. VIII. eap. 7.

APPENDIX.

The tragedy of Anne Boleyn is one of the most mysterious in English history. The execution of a wife on a charge of adultery followed by the immediate marriage of the husband with another woman is in itself a gross combination which points naturally to one conclusion — "None wed the second but who kill the first." The accusations against Anne were of themselves of a monstrous kind. No trace can be found of any previous suspicion of her conduct. She was charged suddenly with the broadest and grossest profligacy. She was hurried out of the world with the most violent precipitancy; and within a few days of her death Jane Seymour was in the place which she had left vacant. The obvious inference is that she was falsely accused, that the King was tired of her, and wished her out of the way, that he might take his pleasure with his new favorite.

On the other hand, there is no sign discoverable that at the time either Anne's execution or the King's re-marriage was disapproved by the country. The proceedings, though hasty, were regular in form, and even studiously and elaborately careful. The Queen and her brother were tried by the Peers, and unanimously condemned. Their uncle, the Duke of Norfelk, sat as High Steward, and both on the trial and afterwards expressed his own conviction of their guilt, though his own family was spotted by their real or supposed infamy. Her father, the Earl of Wiltshire, was on the special commission which condemned the other partners of her guilt, if guilty she was. The venue was laid in different counties that as many juries as possible might survey and pronounce upon the svidence. Of the gentlemen accused, one pleaded guilty; another confessed though he afterwards withdraw his confession. On the scaffold, according to the surviving report of their words, not one of them pretended that they were innocent. They all died acknowledging in general terms the justice of their sentence. Parliament was called to revise the settlement of the Crown. Lords and Commons thanked the King for having taken another wife so speedily, as if it had been an act of marit and almost salf-denial; while there was nothing in the machinery of the Constitution which made the Sovereign the keeper of his subjects' consciences. He had no Prietorians encamped at Westminster to overawe the legislature. Had there been any unanimous discatisfaction with him, the mere household retinues of the Peers could at any moment have overthrown his Government; and even if they can be supposed to have permitted the murder of an innocent woman and five innocent gentlemen on a false charge, it is hardly conceivable that they could have been forced against their convictions to express their deliberate approval of it.

Great, therefore, as the unlikelihoods were on both sides. and grouply suspicious as on the surface of it was the King a conduct, least violence was done to the rules of probability by supposing Anne to have been really a worthless woman. Had the question lain morely between herself and the King, the verdict would have been for her. The King's guilt would have been more probable than here. But the forms observed in the trials, and the acquiescence and approval of Parliament, inclined the balance the other way. It was more likely, so far as the evidence has hitherto stood, that the Queen should have disgraced herself than that the Lords and Commons of England, the Bench of Judges, and the Houses of Convocation should have made themselves parties to a groundless calumny, and given their sanction to an abominable crime. No traces had been as yet discovered of any political motives which could have misled or blinded them. All parties seemed for once united in the prosecution of Anne. The political attitude of the Government did not appear to have been altered by her death; Henry was not reconciled to the Pope; the Princess Mary was not definitely restored to her place in the succession; while Henry as evidently had not made himself an object of horror to his brother sovereigns. Charles V., when Jane Seymour died, was as anxious as if no Anne Boleyn had ever lived or suffered, to secure the King's hand for a kinswoman of his own.

Evidently, however, there remained much to be explained. Anne Boleyn was divorced as well as executed, and the cause of this was left a mystery. Although the outline of the trial had been preserved, the evidence in detail was lost or had been destroyed. There were indications that the King's affection for her had been for some time on the wane, though the causes of the change were obscure. Evidently, too, some relations or other must have existed between Henry and Jane Seymour, though there was nothing beyond rumour to show what those relations had been. It was known only that Jane Seymour's character was without reproach, and that at the time of her marriage and after it she was universally well spoken of

The English records being silent on these points, it became an object to learn what the foreign ambassadors resident at the English Court had to say about them. Charles V., Francis, and the Venetians were each represented here, and light of some kind could not fail to be thrown upon the mystery in their ministers' despatches.

Here, however, was a difficulty of another kind. The letters of M. d'Inteville, the French envoy, show a blank at this particular point. Everything relating to Anne's trial is provokingly absent, either having been purposely destroyed, or having been laid apart as especially curious. In the last case it may yet be discovered. My own search, however, was fruitless, nor could I learn that Mr. Rawdon

Brown had found anything about the trial at Venica. There remained the despatches of Eustace Chapuys, who was the ambassador of Charles V. in England between the years 1529 and 1545. Connected as Charles had been with England, and personally interested as he could not choose but be in the religious revolution from his relationship with Catherine of Arragon, the letters of Chapuva to him could not fail to be profoundly instructive. The difficulty again, however, was to learn where they were. I looked for them at Brussels. I found a few transcripts only, and none of any consequence. M. Gachard, the keeper of the archives there, was in possession of others, a few of which he had published: but these related only to the later period of Chapuys' residence. The rest (all those, at any rate, which I was specially in search of) were gone. I looked for them at Simancas, but they were not there, nor was anything known about them at Madrid.

At length it was suggested to me that they might be at Vienna. The opening of the Austrian archives having been one of the many happy fruits of constitutional liberty in that country, I made inquiries, and found that it was so. Every facility was kindly offered use to see what I wanted, and the vein of information thus opened has proved to be even richer than I expected. The collection contains not Chapuys' correspondence only, but Queen Catherine's and the Princess Mary's, all of it of the very despest interest, and throwing light on all sides of the great questions with which England was agitated.

In this paper I must confine myself to the story of Anne Boleyn, touching other matter only so far as it serves to explain her fate. It is necessary to say that Chapuys was a bitter Catholic. His original mission was to protect the interests of Queen Catherine and her daughter. He regarded her divorce, both politically and religiously, with most profound abhorrence; and he looked on the separation of England from Rome, the Act of Appeals, and the Act of Supremacy, as so many infernal bonds with which the King had sold himself to Hell. Not Pole himself had as bad an opinion of Henry as Chapuys, especially, however, and chiefly on account of the statutes establishing the independence of the Church of England, which form the present basis of its connection with the State. He speaks of the King throughout as the one person whose obstinacy and pride made a reconciliation with Rome impossible. In some instances his accounts can be proved untrue, in others he recalls in a second letter the hasty statements of a first. He cannot be trusted implicitly, but the cautions obviously necessary will not fail to suggest themselves; and with these preliminaries I leave him to tell his own story without further comment. His letters are almost wholly in cipher. There is a decipher between the lines or on the margin, which is faint, small, abounding in contractions, and, in consequence, difficult to read; with the exception of a few words, however, I believe that I have made it out with tolerable accuracy.

We commence, then, with the year 1535. The Pope had implicitly excommunicated the King. He had threatened further to declare him deposed, to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, and to call on Charles V. to carry his sentence into execution. The English Parliament had replied by the Act of Supremacy. They had denied that the Holy See possessed any claim whatsoever upon English subjects or any right to dispose of their allegiance. The Crown, menaced with insurrection, was empowered to call on all persons to disclaim the Pope's pretensions, and to acknowledge that their obligations as subjects were independent of Papal censures.

Upon this the dissatisfied Catholic nobles prepared to take arms.

On January 1, 1535, Chapuys informed the Emperor that Lord Darcy, who in the following year was one of the leaders of the Pilgrimage of Grace, had sent him privately.

by the hands of a Flemish priest, a present of a handsome sword made in modern fashion. He understood it to mean that in Lord Darcy's opinion the time had come for action, and that Lord Darcy was prepared when the Emperor should call upon him to declare openly for Queen Catherine and the Church.

The Earl of Northumberland, who had been Anne Bolsyn's early lover — who, perhaps, as will be seen, had been secretly married to her — was no less discontented, and was swearing vengeance against persons about the Court. The Earl had sent Chapuys word by his physician that the whole realm was in a humour to rebel, and that at a hint from the Emperor, the King could be hurled from his throne. Northumberland added that the "arrogance and makes" of the Lady Anne had become entirely intolerable. She had spoken lately to the Duke of Norfolk in language which would hardly be used to a dog, and the Duke, after leaving her presence, had been so furious that the lightest expression which he used was to call her "grande putain."

On the 14th Chapuys wrote again that Lord Sandys, the Grand Chamberlain, one of the best soldiers in England, had sent him a message, also by his physician, to the same purpose as Darcy and Northumberland. The Emperor, Lord Sandys said, had the hearts of the whole realm, and if he did but know the King's weakness he would not besitate to interfere. Lord Sandys had withdrawn from the Court, and was remaining at home under pretence of illness. The doctors, Chapuys added, made the best of emissaries, as they could go to and fro without exciting suspicion.

³ M. Durcy m'envoya presenter par ledict Prêtre une belle aspên faiote a la moderne et a ce que j'imagins y a du mystere audict present, veuillant deneter par scelle, pusque n'a moyen de le m'envoyer dire accurement, que la seisen moderne seroit propice pour jouer des constanulx.

² Et que le meindre effort que vouldroit faire vestre Ma^{te} ce Bay suroit ruiné et perdu.

^{*} Et apres ledict Northumberland commança a charger sur l'arrogance et malignate de la Dame de ce Roy, disant entre autres choses que ces jeurs else dit plus d'injures au Duc de Norfelk que l'on ne diroit à ung chien, de sort qu'il fut contrainct de sortir de la chambre, et us trouvant en la cele natre que ung auquel ledict Duc ne pourioit bonne affection, toute-fois la colore luy fit oublier cela et l'esmeut a soy declairer andiet personage et luy dire les reproches de l'adicte Dame, entre lesqueix l'ang des moladres estelt de l'appeller grande putain. — Chapeys à l'Emperenz, Janvier 2, 1888.

At that moment an immediate rising was evidently meditated. The Catholic leaders were imprient at the Emperor's hesitation, and Chapuya shared in their restiveness. "These noblemen," he added, "with a little help in money, an bring a hundred thousand men into the field. They consider that the forces to be sent over by your Majesty should announce that they are come not in the quarral of God and the Queen only, but for the relief of the oppressed nation, and the restoration of order and justice. They should come at once, for delay will be dangerous; the King will deprive the present incumbents one after another of their benefices, and will give them to others who will convert and seduce the people."

In the face of these revelations the King's persistence in demanding the Oath of Supremacy appears no longer gratuitous or arbitrary. Queen Catherine feared that the oath would be offered to the Princess Mary, and that if her daughter refused to take it she would be either tried and executed, or at least would be imprisoned for life. Chapuys' instructions were to find means for Mary's escape out of the realm, but Catherine thought the attempt too dangerous, and she too urged the ambassador to quicken the Emperor's movements.

The Duke of Suffolk and Lord Montague were now added to the malcontents. The Duke spoke of Anna Boleyn as bitterly as Norfolk. The Marque of Exeter accord the ambassador that his best desire was to shed his blood for Queen Catherine and the Princess, and that when the time came he would not be the last in the field.

A Bien distingue que le dangier de caste affaire servit à la tardance, con avec le temps ce Roy de ung a aultre privera des benefices tous ceula qui bun luy semblere, et les donne a aultres que converterent et seduyrent la peuple. — Chapays à l'Empereut, Janvier 14 et 28.

Unfortunately for the intending insurgents, Charles was cold. He was occupied with France. He hesitated to countenance rebellion. He was unwilling to recognize in their full extent the pretensions of the Papacy. Instead of offering himself to execute the Bull of Deposition, he interposed to delay the issue of it. Through Chapuys he presched only patience to his sunt and to the English lords, while he made direct and serious efforts to recoucile himself with Henry, and to persuade England to join with him in carrying out the long-talked-of General Council.

Henry was equally anxious to be on good terms with Charles. The difficulty lay only in Queen Catherine and the Princess Mary. The King insisted that the Emperor should recognize the lawfulness of the divorce, and Mary's consequent illegitimacy. Charles, however great his political embarrancements, could not in deceasey abundon his aunt and cousin. In default of action the air began to be filled with rumours and prophecies. Scraps of rhyme portending rebellion were scattered among the people by the priests. Anne Boleyn (the concubine, as Chapuys called her), afraid that Henry might let Charles persuade him, endeavoured by minuter means to rid herself of her dangerous rivals. The King was growing imputiont for the male heir which he had promised himself. "The concubine has bribed some one," so says Chapuys, "to pretend a revelation from God that she can conceive no children as long as Queen Catherine and the Princess are alive. I doubt not she has made the man speak to the King. She has lately cent him to Cromwell, and exclaims increasently that the ladies are rebels and traitoremes, and that they deserve death." 2

1 Chapers à l'Empereur, Février 8 et 25.

^{*} Je no veux oublier que cas jours la concubine a subotne ung que dit avoir en revelacion de Dice que estoit impossible qu'elle sonçount enfant pendant que les dictes deux Dames seroient en vie. Je ne doubte qu'elle l'aura fait parier en Roy, et ces jours elle l'a envoye a Cromwell. Elle ne

There can be no doubt that Heavy would have been antremely glad if his divorced wife, and perhaps his daughter also, could have been removed by any natural means out of his way. They were not only politically embarrassing, but eminently dangerous. Queen Catherine was by no means the meek and suffering saint which she has been sometimes represented. She was a high-spirited woman, keenly conscious of her own and her daughter's wrongs. She had already implored the interference of Charles, and again, as we shall see, she implored it still more carnestly. It had been thought necessary to separate her from Mary. In the middls of March the Princess was ill, and Catherine wrote earneatly to Chapuys begging to be permitted to take charge of her. Dr. Butta, the King's physician, who was secretly Catherine's friend, backed her request, adding that the Princess' disorder might prove dangerous if she was longer parted from her mother. The King, though otherwise anxious that she should have proper assistance, would not hear of it. He reproached Butta with disloyalty. He said he would take good care how he allowed those two ladies to get together. "The Queen was of such high mettle that with her daughter at her side she might assemble a force about her, take the field, and make war upon him with as much spirit as her mother Isabella." 1 He refused to see the Princess himself. (Her illness after all, as Chapuys admitted, was not serious.) He said she was the worst enemy that he had in the world, and that she was the cause of all the trouble which was distracting Christendom.

Either women's lives were held cheap, or even the Emperor, it was thought, would be pleased at heart if the ground of difference could be done away with between himself and his uncle. The Government was preparing to give effect to the Act of Supremacy, and the Princess, if offered the oath, would undoubtedly refuse to take it. Chapuys had been impressing on Cromwell the desirableness of a reconciliation with the Emperor. Cromwell, after a little thought, replied that " the Emperor ought not to let a matter of such vast importance to Christendom be broken off for the sake of the Queen and the Princess. They were but mortal, and the Princess' death would be no great harm if it would restore union between England and the Empire." He spoke "like Caiaphae," Chapuys said in another letter. "He begged me to think it over when I was alone and at leisure." 1 The Council could then go forward and remedy the troubles of Christendom. The interval before it met could be spent in knitting closer the amity between the two Sovereigns. Cromwell repeated that, although the people might murmur, there would be neither danger nor hurt in the Princess' death, and the Emperor had every reason to take that view of it.*

reass de l'autre couste de dire qu'elles sont rebelles et traicterance meritant la mort. — Chapuys à Granvelle, Mars 23.

¹ Car estant la Royne si beultaine de cueur, ley venant en fantasya, a l'appuy de la farcur de la princessa, alle se pourroit mostre au champe et assembler force de gens et ley faire la guerre aussi hardiement que fit la Reyne Dofia Elizabeth sa mera. — Chapuya à l'Empereur, Mars 38.

Chaptrys professes to have replied to this singular anggestion "that there was no occasion to waste time by dwelling on the inconveniences which would arise from the suspicious death of the Princess. He would merely say that he did not see how the Emperor could escape the suspicion of having consented to it, and of having sold his consin for political convenience. This would be a stain on the Emperor's good name which he could not endure; and even if he could be brought to consent, the King ought not to wish it. He would leave the realm at

² Me replicquent de nouveaulx quel dommage ne dangier seroit que la dicte Princesse feust morte, oyres que le peuple su marmurant; et quelle raison auroit vostre Ma^{ta} on faire osa.

Il me dit que Vostre Majeste ne se debveit arrester pour empescher ang si inestimable bien que produiroit en toute la Chretienté l'union et la bonne intelligence dentre Vostre Mate et le Roy son Mautre pour l'affaire des Royne et Princesse qui n'estoient que mortelles, et que ne servit grands dommage de la mort de la diete Princesse au prie de bles que sertiroit de la diete union et intelligence, en quoy me prioit vouloir considerer quand esroy seul et desoccupé.

his death in incredible and unextinguishable confusion, to the serious burden of his conscience.1

The Act of Supremacy was set in motion, but not against the Princess. As yet nothing was likely to be undertaken against her or her mother without the Emperor's leave. But Sir Thomas More and the Bishop of the theater were in the tower, the Charterhouse monks were preparing for martyrdom, and still the thunders of the Church were silent. Charles held back the Pope's hand, and Catherine was in despair. She tried to quicken her ephew's movements.

She wrote to him on the 8th of April that she had been looking for the issue of the sentence, and that she had hoped by that time to have sent him word of the good effects which it had wrought. God, for her sine and the sins of others, had permitted otherwise, but in so just a cause she would not be wanting to herself nor would she offend God by neglecting to use the help of those who could apply a remedy in a case so disastrous. "I cannot, therefore," she said, "but urge and insist to your Majesty, as I have always hitherto done, that you should bear in mind our Holy Catholic faith, and the paril in which this realm is standing for want of the sentence. I entreat for it with all my energy. I am a Christian woman, and stand bound to sue for it in the presence of such scenes as I am obliged to witness. My daughter has been ill, and has not yet recovered. Her treatment is such that were she well it would break her constitution; far less being sick can she regain her health, and if she perish it will be a double sin. Your Majesty will think of means to do us good. . . . Care not for me. I am accustomed to bear any burden. but I must let your Highness understand that I am as Job, waiting for the day when I must go sue for alms for the love of God." 1

¹ Chapuya h. Empereur, Mars 23.

No puedo dexar de enojar y dar peza a V^{ra} Mag^d como basta agora ha Vol. II.

At Chapsys' request the King sent Dr. Butta to visit Mary. Dr. Butts pretended reluctance, to remove the suspicions which Henry entertained of his loyalty. He went, however, and had a private interview with Queen Catherine's physician, who was already in attendance, not so much to consult over the sickness of the Princess as over the disorders of the realm and the medicines to be used for these.

"He is a very clever man," wrote Chapuvs, " and is intimate with the nobles and the Council. He says there are but two ways of doing anything for the Queen and Princess, and the nation in general. One would be, if God pleased, to visit the King with some little meledy.1 He might then reflect on his own conduct, and listen more patiently to remonstrance. The other was force, of which he says that the King and those who manage matters stand in marvellous fear. If it come to this, he thinks the King will be especially careful of the safe keeping of the Queen and Princess, meaning to use them, if the worst comes to the worst, as mediatresses of peace. If neither of these two means be tried, he thinks their lives are in danger. Your Majesty, he says, cannot know with what case the King can be overthrown, twenty of the principal noblemen. accetumbrado, suplicando quiera tener memorya de muestra fe Catolica y del puligro que este Reyno esta por falta della. Il esto pido tan affectnosamento questo puede, porque como Christiana my obligada e hacerlo. viendo la necedidad que voo. . . My hiju a cetado enferma y agore, no esta bion cana, y al tratamicato suyo es tal que basta para hacer enferme sun sano, quanto mas para curar à sufermo. . . . By, con la manera que con ella usa, pereciese, serya el pecado doblado. Ve Mage pensara en semadyo. . . . No hay necessidad de hacer à caso de my por estar acontumbrada a sufrir cualquiera carga, mas no dezare de hacer caber à 🖓 🖛 Altesa que estoy como Job — esperando el dya que tengo de ye a pedir per amor de Dios lymoma. — La Reyau Caterina al Emperador, Abril II. 1 Le premier setoit el Dieu voulont visiter ce Roy de quelque patita maledis. The words are ambiguous. Dr. Butts might mean that the maledy was to be said from Heaven; but he was speaking of methods by which a particular state of things might be not right q and the word "petite" boks as if he thought the dimensions of the disease might be controlled by himself.

and more than a hundred knights being ready to employ their lives, their goods, their friends and retainers in the cause, with the least assistance in the world from your Majesty." 1

The King carried a bold front to the danger with which he knew himself to be threatened. The sentence of deposition was daily expected. He was determined to exact, before it appeared, an acknowledgment from the most influential of the Catholic party that the Pope had no authority over him or them. The Charterhouse monks refused the outh, and were executed. More's and Fisher's turns were coming, and if Chapuys was rightly informed, Queen Anne was using all her influence to persuade the King to extend the same measure to Cathorine and Mary.

"I am told privately," he said, "that many times lately the concubine has blamed the King for his remissuess, telling him that it was a shame to himself and to the realm (to spare them), and that they ought to be punished as traitorcases under the form of the statute."

"The said concubine," he continued, "is prouder and haughtier than ever. She dares, as I hear, to tell the King that he is as deeply bound to her as man can be bound to woman, for that she has been the cause of saving him from the sin in which he was living, and that, moreover, through her means, he would be soon the richest prince that ever reigned in England."

So secure the unfortunate woman considered herself in her greatness, that she claimed to direct the politics of the realm. All her sympathies were with France: every min ister who furthered or tried to further the Imperial and ance fell under her displeasure, and she was unmeasured in the violence with which she addressed them. Even Cromwell, who had been considered her right hand, did not feel himself secure. He told Chapuys, at the beginning of June, that if she knew the familiarity that existed between Chapuys and himself she would do him an ill-turn. She had reproached him for something three days before, he mid, and had told him then that she would see his head taken off his shoulders; but he had such confidence in the King his master that he did not think she could harm him.

Affirmant pour tout certain qu'il y avoit une XX des principaule. Seigneurs d'Angletzere et plus de cent shevallers tous dispeces et prestes a employer personnes biens amys et subjects syant le moindre assistance du monde de V²⁸ Ma²⁶. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Avril 26.

^{*} A quoy poussem de tout son pouvoir la consubine que nagueres a plusieure fois sifirmé et inculpé audict Roy que ce luy estoit houte et a tout le Royaulum qu'ailes servient pugnies comm a traiciermese a la forme des seatures.

Chapuya & l'Hasperson, Mai 9.

Another thing Chapuys learnt about her was that she never cessed, day or night, to endeavour to bring the Duke of Norfolk into diagrace with the King — perhaps because he was in the habit of speaking freely of her character: 1 perhaps because Cromwell wished to break the power of the great nobles, and was commencing with the chief among them.

At this crisis the Pope, with a reshness and timidity which were equally impolitic, while he still withheld the Bull of Deposition, which was to have been the signal for a rising, created Fisher, who was defying the Act of Supremacy in the Tower, a cardinal. The King, meeting defiance with defiance, said that if Fisher was to have a red hat he would send his bead to Rome to have it fitted on. Commissioners were sent instantly to require the submission of the Bishop and Sir Thomas More. They both refused. Fisher was executed first, and then More, and the indignation and fear of the Catholic party rose to fever heat. The London populace, who were on the King's side, increased their fury by bringing out a mystery play, in which the principal feature was the beheading of recalcitrant priests The King, as if to good them into madness, came up from Windsor to be present at the performance.

¹ Bien un l'on certifie de bon lieu que indicte Dume un consuit muyt us jour pour mectre en diagrace du Rey le Duc de Norfolk. Ne seuy si c'est pour es qu'il parle liberalement d'elle, ou que Cromwell veuillant abaisse, les grande veuille commesser a luy.

Either Sandys or Darcy again implored Chaptys to rouse the Emperor from his inaction, and to persuade him, if he would do no more, at least to permit the issue of the Bull of Deposition. Something, they insisted, must be done with speed, or the modern preachers and prelates would corrupt the whole nation. The clergy would furnish money for the beginning of the insurrection, and means would be found also to plunder the King's treasury.

The Princess Mary still wished to escape abroad, that she might be out of the way when the rebellion broke out. She harassed Chaptrys continually with entreaties to provide her with means. After More's execution, also, it seemed but too likely that her own life would not be spared. Chapuye could not bring himself to allow her to run any risk. Cromwell, who, notwithstanding that he had spoken like Caiaphas, really wished to save her, believed her best protection would be in some marriage abroad, to which the King might consent. Chapuys, however, considered that the King, being under the influence of Anne, would never be persuaded to allow it. "If the concubine is to be believed," he wrote in deep despondency, " the downy will cost but little, for the is crying incestantly to the King that he does noither well nor presidently in allowing the Queen and Princess to live, seeing they have deserved death for more than those who have been executed, and are the cause of all the trouble."

Le bon vicula sieur dont sy cydevant escript a V M. M m'envoys l'autre jour aon ecusin sinsi qu'il vouloit partir pour s'en alier en sa maison, et me prie de [words illegible] et plusieurs autres de vouloir soliciter devers V * Ma* le impetracion des executoriales et que ce meyennent que Vortre Ma* n'auroit commodite ou volunte de faire autre amistance, il pensoit qu'il y aureit moyen de hien tout y remedier, pour ven que les dictes axecutoriales ne tardant, car autrement les modernes précheurs et prelais subverteront tout le peuple. Il dit d'avantage qu'il pense que les ecclessatiques fourniroyent pour le commencement, et que capendant bien peurroit trouver meyen de mectre le main sur se grand tresor que ce Roy tient en sa maison en cente ville. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Juillet 11.

^{*} Je croys bien que ce n'est le plus grand soury de ce Boy marier ladicts

After More's death the King west on progress, and Chapuys could not speak too bitterly of the favour with which he was received by the people. He won the hearts of the towns by enriching them with grants out of the spoils of the monasteries. He carried preschers with him who attracted large audiences; and audiences, strange to say, which let themselves be persuaded that the King was doing right.

"He is on the borders of Wales," reported the ambassa-dor, "bunting and visiting the country, and all to gain the hearts of the people. For this he uses all imaginable means, and I am told that a good part of the peasantry in the districts where he has been, after hearing the Court preachers, are abused into the belief that he was inspired by God into separating from his brother's wife. They are but a set of idiots. They will return soon enough to the truth when there are any signs of a change."

A feature in the expected Bull of Deposition was to be a clause forbidding all Catholic nations to hold intercourse with the English who continued obedient to the King. At that moment Henry distrusted the disposition of France towards him almost as much as that of the Empire. Catherine had entreated the regent Mary to use her influence with her sister the French Queen to bring Francis, as she cynically said, to show himself a true friend of his brother of England, by assisting in delivering him from a state of sin, and there was reason to fear that she had not been wholly unsuccessful. The effect of the sentence, if it destroyed the commerce of the English by cutting off their communication with the Continent, was seriously feared. And it was for this reason, and for the impulse which it would thus lend to the intended rebellion, that the issue of it was so earnestly pressed. The harvest had failed. There was likelihood of famine, and as Cromwell acknowledged to Chapuys, the Bull, if obeyed in earnest in France and by the subjects of the Emperor, would create the greatest distress and confusion. The Geraldines were in rebellion in Ireland. "Your majesty would not believe," Chapuys wrote on September 6, "how continually I am importanted on all sides for the issue of the censures. They think here now that that alone would suffice to put a speedy end to the disorder here."

Princesse, et si in concubine est de croyre, le dot ne coutere pas beaucoup, car elle ne come de cryer apres ledict Roy qu'il ne fait bien ny prudemment de sutrir vivre lesdictes Boyne et Princesse qui meritolest trop plus la mort que coulx qui out este executes et qu'elles estoient cause de tout — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Juillet 24.

1 Chaptry & l'Empereur, Acust 10.

² Cuando se vyese con la Señora Reyna su hermana despues de dadas mys affectuosas encomiendas rogarie de rei parte quiriese taner mencion de my con el Christianussimo Rey ou manido y hacer quanto pudiese ser que le sea buen amygo el Rey my Señor procurando de quitarie del pecade en que esta — La Reyna Catherina à la Reyna Maria, vili de Agusto.

Again, on the 25th, to Granvelle :-

Every man of any position here is in despair at the Pope's hesitation, and at the intercourse being allowed to continue with Flanders and Spain. If means be not taken promptly there will be no longer hope, either for the good ladies where lives are in danger, or for religion, which is going daily to destruction. Things are come to such a pass, that in various places they now preach against the excrament. The Emperor, so the first Prince in Christendom, is bound to interfere. He can do as much good by coming here as ever he did in Africa, with far greater case, and with incomparably more political advantage.¹

The Emperor, entangled for the present in a war with the Turks, and with a fresh quarrel with France impending over him in Italy, had, unfortunately for the hopes of the Catholics, no leisure to attend to these English matters. He was unwilling to allow the sentence to come out before he was prepared to act upon it. For his own subjects' sake be did not wish their trade with London to be indefinitely suspended, nor would he, if he could help it, show disrespect to the Papal consures by allowing them to be disregarded. Granvelle wrote that he was horrified at the enormity of Henry's conduct. He was confident that God would punish him. But for himself, he said, he was so much occupied that he had scarcely time to breathe, and both he and his master continued to hope for a reconcilation, and to imagine that sooner or later matters would be settled peacefully by diplomacy.³

¹ Chapsys à Granvelle, Septembre 25.

Before Granvelle's despatch could have arrived in England the Queen and Princess were in a fever of expectation. It is necessary to attend particularly to the letters which follow, for however cruelly they had been used they were still English subjects, and although they may be acquitted in point of conscience for almost any measures to which they might have recourse to right themselves, yet to move directly in their own persons to bring about invasion and insurrection was really treason, and (since if she did not know what they were doing she could not but suspect it) this explains, if it does not justify, the engarness of Anna and her friends to have them put out of the way.

The Princess Mary then, some time in October, wrote to Granvelle thus: —

The state of affairs is obtable and weres thus wretched. Things will fail to rum and total perdation, unless his Mayesty, for the service of God, the walfare and repose of Christendeun, the bosor of the King my father, and companion for the poor afflicted scale here, will take brief order and apply the remody, as I hope and feel assured that he will do if only he be thoroughly informed of what has taken place here. Occupied as he has been in his so less accred than necessary expedition to Tunis, he will have been unable to realize the character, the weight, the importance, the danger of the scadition is which we are piaced. The whole truth cannot be teld in letters, and therefore I would have you despatch one of your people to his Majority to inform him of everything, and to supplicate him, on the part of the Queen my mother and myself, for the honor of God, and for other respects on well, to attend to our condition and make provides for up. In so doing he will perform a service meet agreeable to Almighty

I Granvelle adde a passage about Cranmer which deserves attention:

No venix je delanear de vose dire cas deux mots, que je m'eshabye fort des termes estranges que comme l'on a entende du Court de Rome tient l'Archevesque de Canterbury, masmes en l'affaire des Boyne et Princesse d'Angleterre, attendre que durant le temps qu'il estoit resident en cest Court, il blamoit mirablement en que le Roy d'Angleterre son maistre et ses autres ministres falsesent en l'affaire du divorce en contre leedktes Royne et Princesse. Male je voye qu'il a bien changé d'opinion; soler que aussi plusionn en escriprent entrangement. — Minute d'une lettre de Seigneur de Granvelle escrite à Entage (Naguya, 26 Septembre.

Ged, nor will be sequire less frame and glony to himself than in the ensquest of Tunio or in all his African expeditions.³

Except by forbearance and persuasion—the means which he was already trying, and was driving Mary's friends into despair by persisting in them—there were but two ways in which the Emperor could interfere successfully: either by declaring war and sending over an army, or by cutting off all communication between his own subjects and the English, and thus precipitating no less certainly either war, or rebellion, or both. The allusion to Tunis points to an armed expedition. But, in either case, had this letter fallen into an enemy's hands, the writer of it could hardly have escaped an indictment for high treason, and had she been tried she would not have escaped conviction.

Queen Catherine addressed herself immediately to the Pope. Whether the Emperor moved or not, the Pope could, at any rate, issue his Bull. A successful rising in England in defence of the Church could hardly be looked for while the Church itself continued silent.

Most holy and most blassed Father [she wrote], I kim your Holinson? hands. My letters have been full of importunities and complaints, and thus have been more calculated to give you pain then pieceure. I have therefore for some time caseed to write to your Hollness, or to putition you. though I have burdened my conscious by silence, to pay more attention to what is passing in this realm. I have but one estimaction in thinking of these things. I have never coused to thank our Lord Joses Christ for having appointed — now in a time when Christendom is in such straits a vicar like your Holmess, of whom from all sides I hear to much good. God in His mercy has preserved you for this hour. Once more, thursdays, like an obedient child of the Holy See, as all my ancestors have been, I do entrust you to bear in special memory this realm, the King my lord and hasband, and my daughter. Your Holiness and all Christendous know what things are done here, with how great offence to God, how great coapdal to the world, how great repreach to your Hollman. If a remady he not shortly applied there will be no end to condemning souls and to making martyrs. The good will be constant and will suffer. The lukewarm, swing more to aid them, may possibly fall, and the rest will stray out of the way like sheep that have lost their shepherd. I lay these things before your Holmess, because I know not any one on whose conscience the martyrdem of these holy and virtuous persons and the rain of so many souls sught to tie more heavily than on yours, in that your Holmess neglects to encounter to great an evil, which the Devil, as we see, has sown smong us.

¹ Et iny supplier de la part de la Royne ma more et myeens, en Phonesus de Dieu et pour aultres respects que dessus vouloit entendre et pour-veoyr sux affaires dyry, en quoy fora trus agrechie service a Dieu et n'en acquerra moure de veu et glorre qu'en la conquerte de Thurse et de toute l'affaire Afrique. — De la Princesse d'Angletorre à l'Ambassadour, Outubre, 1826.

I write frankly to your Holiness for the ducharge of my own conscience, as to one who, as I hope, can feel [with me] and my daughter the deaths of these hely men. It is a mountful pleasure to me to think that we shall follow them in the manner of our torments [a few words are here illegible] otherwise we shall sing Gloria in Excelsis Dec. And so I end, waiting for the remedy from God and from your Holiness; and may it some speedily, also the time will be past. Our Lord defend your Holiness' person.¹

Accompanying these letters was a long, passionate address from Chapuys to Charles himself, begging him in the name of the great Catholic party to strike in without further hesitation. The execution of More and Fisher, the suppression of the monasteries, and the famine from the failure of harvest, had combined to create an opportunity which might never return. If the Emperor declared himself at once he would have the whole country at his side, and the King would fall without a blow.

The Emperor, as we have seen, had otherwise decided, but his resolution was not known to Chapuya before November, and in England generally was not known at all. Both the Court and the Catholies were expecting to hear any day that the Bull was out, and that Charles had undertaken the execution of it, and the fever of fear and hope and distrust and suspicion may easily be imagined. At such a time infinite lies would be inevitably flying, and reports of any kind coming from people living in such a state of excitement must be received with the greatest hesitation. On one point, however, there was a persistence and uniformity in the accounts which were carried to Chapays. The danger of Catherine and Mary was every bour increasing, and the person who was most assiduously urging their death was Anne Boleyn. Anne and her friends knew well that an insurrection which restored Catherine to her rank as Queen would be the certain signal of their own destruction. Politicians knew that the life of the Princess Mary was essential to the success of either rebellion or invasion. The people would have no heart to overthrow the Government unless they had some one to take the King's place. If Mary was removed there was not a person on whom the nobles could agree as a successor to the crown; and Charles, though he might risk an invasion to maintain his aunt and cousin, would scarcely venture it to avenge their execution, unless he saw his way to some subsequent settlement.

³ La Beyna Catherina à Su^a Sant^a, Ottubre 10.

Chapays & l'Empereur, Octobre 13.

Thus we read without surprise, and with no difficulty in believing it, that on November 6th Chapuys learnt from the Marchieness of Exeter that the King had determined the two poor ladies should either break or bend. He had been heard to say to one of his most intimate advisers that he would endure no longer the alarm and anxiety which the Queen and Princess caused him. Parliament was about to meet, and the matter should then be considered. He swore peremptorily that he would wait no further.¹

The Marchioness and that her information was as true as the Gospel. She bade Chapuys for God's sake to let the Emparer know it, and beg him in pity to do something for the honour of God and the obligations of his relationship.

The influence at work with Henry, Chaptrys explained more particularly and emphatically to Granvelle.

"What I have written to his Majesty," he said, "is but too true; and I believe this she-devil of a concubine" (ceste diablesse de concubine) " will never rest till she has made on end, and is quit of these unhappy ladies. Bhe works towards it by all imaginable means."

Tout a cost instant le Marquise de Exeter m'e envoyée dire que ce Roy a dernierement dit a see plus prives conseilliers qu'il ne rouleit plus desseurer en [les] facheusse crainctes et possessents qu'il avoit de long-tampe en a cause des Royne et Princeses ; et qu'ils regardassent a ce prochain Purisment l'en faire quiete, jurant bien et tres phetimement qu'il n'actendoit plus lenguement de y pourvoir — à l'Empereur, Nov. 6.

A fortnight later he wrote in the same strain. "The Marchioness of Exeter has been with me in diagnise, and repeated her warning. . . . The concubine who has conspired the death of the said ladies thinks of nothing but to get them despatched. It is she who commands and governs all, and the King will not contradict her. The case is most dangerous. It is to be feared, as I have already written, that he will make his Parliament and the estates of the realm the partners, and as it were the authors of his misdeeds; that by this means losing hope of pardon and mercy from your Majesty, they may be the more resolute at all hazards to defend themselves."

Negotiations had been going forward for a permanent settlement between France and the Empire. Had they been successful, as at one time appeared likely, the Emperor would in all probability have now yielded to the solicitations which were pressed upon him. It was not to be, however. France was determined to have the Duchy of Milan: the Emperor could not bring himself to part with it. Francis was again at Henry's feet soliciting his alliance, and Charles could not venture the risk of driving them into a combination against him. The English Parliament, whatever might be the cause, stood by the King in all his darkest measures. The Peers, who were offering him their services, were part of that Parliament, and attempted no opposition there. How could be trust their constancy in the field when they showed so little resolution in the Senate House? He refused to believe that the danger was as great or the King as inhuman as Chapuys represented.

¹ Elle ne semera jamais jusques elle sit une fin et soit quiete de ces pauvres Dames a quey elle travaille par tous les moyens qu'elle pent imaginer. — Chaptrys à Grenvelle, Nov. 6.

Davantage is conculted qui... a conjurée et computée la mort accident Dames... no panse en rien tant que de les faire despecher. Est celle qui sommande et gouverne le tout et a laquelle lediet Roy ne sauroit contredire. Le cas est fort dangeroux... est de s'en doubter il vouldre comme j'ay deja escript faire participans comme suitaire de telé manfaietz ceulx de con Parlement et cetatu du Royaulmen a fin que par ce moyen perdent l'espeir de la clemance et misericerde de V^{re} Ma^{la} toutefois funerat plus determines a se defendre. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Nov. 28.

"What you tell me," he wrote to Chapuys, "is a thing too cruel and too horrible to credit. The King cannot be so unnatural as to put to death his wife and his daughter." The threat of doing it can be intended only to frighten them into compliance."

"They must not take the oath," he continued, "if it can possibly be avoided; but if the peril is real, and there is no other means of escape, non must tell them from me that they must give way. An oath so sworn cannot prejudice them."

The knot was cut, so far as concerned Queen Catherine. in a manner atterly unforeseen. She was not old - she was still under fifty; her health had been good, considering what she had suffered, and during the gutumn she had been unusually well. Rumors reached London towards the end of November that something was wrong with her, but no great attention was paid to them. Chapuys, on the 30th, had a stormy interview with Henry. The King said that he was entreated by France to join in a league against the Emperor, and he feared that for his own safety he might be driven to comply. "The Emperor had behaved to him with the most inconceivable ingratitude, and at the instigation of a woman had occasioned him infinite trouble. The Pope himself had confessed that the Emperor had compelled him by force and menace to take the part which he had done about the divorce." *

¹ C'est chose tant cruelle et horrible que sul puet achever de croyre que ledict Boy fust tant desnaturel que de faire mourir lesdictes Dames ses femme et fille. — L'Empereur à Chapuys, Nov. 26.

^{} Et que vostre Ma luy aviot use de la plus grande ingratitude que l'on scauroit dire, solicitant a l'appetit d'une femue, tant de choses contre luy, que luy avoit faict innumerables maux et facheries, et de telle importamen

While the King was speaking news came in from Kimbolton that the Queen's illness had taken an alarming form, and that her life was in imminent danger. Henry said coldly that "her death might remove the grounds of difference with the Emperor."

He had never concealed that on general grounds he would prefer the Imperial alliance to the French, and that he was ready to return to it as soon as Charles would coase to support Catherine's cause.

The Queen, Chapuys thought, could scarcely be so ill as the messenger reported. He prepared, however, to go immediately to Kimbolton, and he asked permission to take the Princess Mary with him. Henry gave him an ambiguous answer. He was deeply respicious, and, as we have seen, not without reason. He said he would think of it, and must wait till he had heard more, or words to that effect.

The alarming account, however, proved too well founded. The Queen lingered for a few weeks. On December 13 she wrote her last letter to the Emperor. Her handwriting, usually remarkably bold and powerful, had become feeble and tremulous, and in the staggering and barely legible lines I make out with difficulty only that she expected something desperate to be attempted against her in the approaching Parliament, which would be a scandal to the world, and her own and her daughter's destruction.

After this there are no more traces of her pen. On the seventh of January she died. One curious circumstance is mentioned about her death. Chapuys writes that when in extremis she declared to her physician qu'elle n'avoit que vostre Ma³⁶ par menseses et force avoit fait donner la sentence contre luy comme le mesme Pape l'avoit confessé.

Disant davantage que cela seroit exter l'empeschement que mectreyent les scrupules entre Y^{} Ma^{} et luy.

Ce qu'il refuse de prime face, et luy ayant fait quelques remonstrances.
Il dri que bien il y penseroit et awest aviz. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Nev. 20.

oneques este cogneu du Prince Arthur, mais la marimon es trouble le luy fit oublier.¹

It was inevitable that her death, occurring at such a time. so opportunely, should be attributed in the excited state of feeling to foul play. Although the most energetic half of the nation had gone along with the King in the revolt from the Papacy, Queen Catherine had always retained their respect and affection. They admired her character, they pitied her sufferings, and there were few English of any creed who did not believe in their hearts that the claims of the Princess Mary on the succession were superior to those of the daughter of Anne. It was no less inevitable that the rival who was universally believed to have been instigating the King to put Cathering and Mary to death should now be charged with having accelerated the event which she so much desired by unlawful means. Anne Boleyn was supposed to have poisoned Catherine, and to meditate sending her daughter after her on the same road.

Chapuys, in describing Catherine's death to his master, said that it was in all respects a terrible business; "especially," he wrote, "because I fear the good Princess will never wear mourning. The concubine will save her the trouble, as she has long time threatened; that is, she will have her hilled." "Indeed," he added, "this is to be feared, unless speedy means be taken. I will do my best to comfort and console the Princess. I have many times asked the physician if he suspected poison. He said he feared it, for the Queen had never been well after she had drunk some Welsh been; but it must have been a slow poison and canningly composed, for he admitted that he had seen no signs of poison pure and simple, and on the opening the body he would have found traces of it."

In a more composed condition of the public mind a Chaptrys to Granvelle, Janvier 21.

De demanday per plusiours fois an moderia s'il y avoit quelque soubton de vanin. Il me dit qu'il s'en doubteit, me depuis qu'elle avoit ben remote which was probably without a shadow of foundation would soon have died away. In the atmosphere of impassioned animosity suspicion turned to certainty. The physician who at first acknowledged that he had found no decided symptoms, assured himself on a second examination of the body that there was no room for doubt. Every other organ was sound and healthy, but the heart was black. The crime was but too certainly proved.

The King was not suspected. Dark as was Chapuys' opinion of Henry, he never dreamt for a moment that he would have consented to or prompted murder. All was charged upon the miserable Anne; and as it had fared with the mother so he was assured it would fare with the daughter. Charles's letter, advising that the Queen and Princess should yield at the last extremity, reached the ambassador while his grief and horror were fresh. The Queen was beyond the reach of further trouble. The Princess remained, however, and Chapuys could not contemplate without alarm the probable result of her compliance.

Not only was there the objection, admitted by Charles himself, that infinite numbers of people would lose heart when they saw her yield, and would follow the new hereay, but there was another and a worse possibility which the Emperor had not anticipated. The danger would no longer be that the King would proceed by way of law to punish the Princess for disobedience. It would rather lie concealed behind a show of reconciliation and a colour of kind treatment.

"I am not afraid of the King," Chapuys said, "but of the concubine. She has often sworn that the ladies should both die, and, unless the King change his mind and check her lest the realm be set on fire, she will never rest till she d'une cervise de Galles elle n'avoit fait bien, et qu'il fallioit que ne fust poison termines et artificieure, car il ne veoit les signes de simple et pur venin et a l'ouvrir l'on en veue les indion. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Janvier 3.

La chose estoit trep verifiée. — À l'Empereur, Jenvier 21.

has accomplished her desire or while either of them remains alive. . . . She will have better means and opportunities than before to execute her accursed purpose and give the Princess poison. There will be less distrust, and she will think it can be done without exciting suspicion, for the Princess having yielded to the King's pleasure, and having been reconciled to him and kindly treated and restored to her rights, there will then be no fear of harm to her, and if she dies no magivings of foul play." 1

The ill-feeling towards Anne was not diminished by the unconcealed satisfaction which she displayed when the news of Catherine's death arrived at the Court. She gave Lord Montague, who informed her of it, a handsome present. Her father, Lord Wiltshire, her brother Rochford, and all her party united with her in indecent exultation; her father and brother especially saying the only misfortune was that the daughter had not borne the mother company.

The King, though he showed some natural emotion, yet was no less politically gratified. "Praise be to God!" he exclaimed, "we are now out of danger of war. Now we will give the French a lesson, and teach them how to triffe with us." The obstacle was removed to his reconciliation with the Emperor, and Cromwell as entirely expected a reconciliation with the Pope. "In a few days," Cromwell said at a dinner party in London, "we shall hear of the coming over of a legate."

Google

FOL. IL

I Je no cuyde pas du Roy mais [de] la concentine qui convent a furd la mort de toutes deux et qui no sem eneques en repos qu'elle p'ayt accomplie con decir (presuppesant que selon la mutabilité de ce Roy il n'y a arreste ne feu mecte en son estat) pendant que nulle desdictes Dames vivra. Aura trop meilleur moyen et commodite d'executer sa mandicta volunte et leur faire ministrer venyn que paravant. Car l'on s'en mefereit moings, et d'ailleurs elle se penserolt faire sans suspicion. Car l'on presumeroit que en ayant lesdictes Dames consentyes a tout ce que le roy vouloit et estant si bien reconciliees et tres favorablement praietees, et que ayant reade a leurs drolets, il r'y anroit plus a craindre qu'elles puissent auyre, il ny suroit suspicion de leurs fait faire manvais tour. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Janvier 21. [The continued use of the plumi after Catherine was deed was probably a mistake of the decipherer.]

The religious aspect of the Reformation has so eclipsed the other features of it that we forget the political currents which so strongly influenced its history. At this moment the Imperialist faction and the French faction at the English Court were as keenly opposed as Catholics were opposed afterwards to Protestants. Anne Boleyn was French; her friends were French. She was identified with the change of policy which had divided Henry from his hereditary ally, and a reversion to the old connection could not fail to affect materially her position and prospects. Her husband was free at last from Catherine, even in the eyes of the Roman Curis, and so far his bonds with herself might appear to be rather strengthened than loosened. If the Princess Mary was out of the way, both the Pope and Charles might now consent to recognize her as lawful Queen. On the other hand, the King's affection for her during the past year had for some reason or other been growing cool. The great English nobles, who from the first had borne her no good will, had been still further alienated by her insolence and arbitrary manners. In the last half-year their indignation had risen to fever heat from the belief that she was instiguting Henry to destroy Catherine and the Princess. Catherine the was now believed to have assessinated. And to them and to the Emperor. and to the whole party with which Henry would be now once more in close connection, his separation from the woman whom half England regarded only as his concubine, and called his concubine, and who had been the occasion, if not the cause, of the guarrel of Henry with his old friends, could not fail to be welcome to all of them as a propitiatory mentice, while a marriage with some other lady, which would be open to no suspicion, might satisfy the general graving for a male heir which Anne as well as Catherine had disappointed. Anne was at present excession

If a boy came all would be well; but she had miscarried of a son once — a second failure might be dangerous.

However this might be, the Princess Mary's restoration to her rank was likely to follow sooner or later on a reconciliation with Charles—that is, if the Princess Mary was allowed to continue alive. Either with the treacherous purpose attributed to her by Chapuys, or, far more likely, from a sense that the Princess' friendship might be more useful to her than her enmity, Anne, who had hitherto turned Mary into ridicule (dont toutefois elle ne se fait que rire), now made advances to her. She wrote to advise her to comply with her father's wishes, and in the event of her doing so promised to use her influence to replace her in his favour.

Mary, whose natural abhorrence of Anne was now aggravated by grief and despair, who believed that Anne had murdered her mother, and possibly intended the same kind office to herself, replied indignantly that she would sooner die a hundred times than change her opinion or act against her honor and conscience.

Angry at the rejection of her overtures, Anne allowed herself to be carried away by her temper, and wrote a letter to Mrs. Shelton, Mary's governess, which Chapuys called a defamatory libel (livel diffamatoirs control a princesse), a letter perhaps which conceals some latent misgiving behind a tone of affected haughtiness. Mrs. Shelton may have shown it to her ward. Mary at any rate procured a copy, and sent it to Chapuys.

Mrs. Shellow, — My pleasure is that you no further seek to move the Lady Mary towards the King's grace other than as he himself directed in his own words to her. What I have done myself has been more from charity than became the King or I can care what course she takes, or whether she will change or will not change her purpose. When I shall have a con, as soon I look to have, I know what then will come to her. Remembering the word of God that we should do good to our ensures, I have wished to give her notice before the time, because, by my daily experience, I know the wisdom of the King to be such that he will not value her repeatance on the presention of her made on and unnatural obstinacy when she has no longer power to choose. She would acknowledge her errors and svil conscience, by the law of God and the King, if hind affection had not so scaled her eyes that she will not see but what she pleases.

Mrs. Shelton, I beseech you trouble not yourself to turn her from any of her wilful ways, for to me she can do neither good nor ill. Do your own duty towards her, following the King's commandment, as I am assured that you do said will do, and you shall find me your good hidy whatever comes.

Your good mistress,

Ansa: R.

In writing this letter Anne probably expressed more confidence than she felt. Henry's mind was still as fixed as ever on the hope which had formed his plea for separating from Catherine. The kingdom required a male heir, and if she failed herself to provide it she was beginning to fear that he would look elsewhere as he had looked before.

Chapuya was not hopeful. The King at a great ball at the Court had carried the Princess Elizabeth estentationaly in his arms. She had been taken to mass with trumpets and a triumphal procession. More than ever it had seemed that his hopes and his affection were centered on the offtpring of the concubine.¹

Yet there was a whisper in the air which he was rather inclined to ridicule than to believe, yet which he thought it worth his while to communicate to the Emperor.

"A few days since," he wrote on January 29, "I heard from several quarters that the concubine, notwithstanding the delight which she displayed at the news of the good Queen's death, yet nevertheless has since been often seen in tears, fearing that they may venture to deal with her as they dealt with that good Queen. This morning a message has come to me from the lady I mentioned in my letter of the 6th of November, and from her husband" (the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter), "how they had been advertised by a chief person at the Court that the King had said to some one as a great secret, and as it were in confession, that he had married this woman seduced and constrained by "sortileges," and for that cause he held the marriage void. God, he said, had made it clear to him, having ".... (word illegible in the MS.) "promised that he should have a male child. He conceived that he might take another wife, as he implied that he desired to do. It is hard for me to believe this, though it came from good authority. I will note carefully what indications there may be that it is true."

³ Le jour suyvant qui fust le Dimanche ce Roy fust tout accoustré de jaune de pied a cap, s'il ne fust la plume blanche qu'il avoit, au boanet, et fust la petite bastarde conduicte e la Messe avec trompettes et aultres grans triomphes. L'après dique le Roy se trouva en la sale ou dansoient les Dames, et la comme transporté de joye fist plusieurs choses. En fin il fet querrir la petite bastarde, et la pourtant entre ses bras il l'alloit monstrant a ung puis a l'antre. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, Janvier 21.

Fortune was not Anne Boleyn's friend. On the 29th of January, the day on which Queen Catherine was buried, the unlucky Anne was confined with a dead boy. The King was much agitated. During the three preceding months he had not spoken ten times to her. He went to her bedside when he learnt his misfortune, but said merely it was but too plain that God would give him no male children, and then turning away and leaving her, he added, angraciously, that when she was recovered he would speak with her.

De quoy ledict Hoy a demonstré grand deul et tristeme.

If y a qualquas jours qu'il me fast dit de divers lieux ou je n'adjoustess grande fey que la concubine de ce Boy non obstant qu'elle eust monstré grande joye des nouvelles du treppes de la benne Royne, que toutzfeis depuis elle aveit souvent larmoyé s'en doubtant que l'on occroit faire d'elle comme de la bonne Royne. A ce matin l'on m'est venu dire de la part de la Dame mencionnée en mes lectres du vi de Novembre et de son mari qu'ils esteient advertis d'une des principaulx de Court que ce Roy aveit den dire a quelcung par grand secret et comme en confession qu'il avoit faiet ce mariage neduiet et constrainet de sortileges, et que a ceste cause il tenoit cediet mariage aul. Et que bien le monstroit Dies qui . . , promectoit avoir ligne masculine. Et que bien le monstroit Dies qui . . , promectoit avoir ligne masculine. Et qu'il tenoit qu'il en pouvoir prondre une autre—ce qu'il donnoit a entendre avoyt envye de faire. Le chose m'est bien dufficie a croyre, syres qu'elle seit venu de bon heu. J'auray soing de considerer quelle apparence on indice y aura. — Chapuye à l'Requereur, Janvier 29.

Pentando de plusieure de neste Court qu'il y a passé trois mois que ce

She was very miserable. She accused the Duke of Norfolk, whom Chapuya tells us she still hated, as having been the cause of her calamity, by the rudeness with which a week before he had delivered her a message from the King. But the Duke insisted that there had been nothing either in the message or in the manner in which it was delivered to agitate her, and that she had received it without agus of disturbance. Some people said that she was constitutionally unable to bear children; others, that she feared the King might treat her as the late Queen had been treated. Report whispered that he had lately made large presents to a lady at the Court named Jane Seymour.

Anne said that her love for the King was deeper than the love of the late Queen; and that her heart was broken when she saw his affection given to others. The King, though it was Carnival time and there was a high feetival at Greenwich, preferred to leave her there, and remained alone in London.

The position of Mary, meanwhile, was slightly improved. Crowwell sent to tell Chapuys that on her mother's death it was proposed to increase her establishment, as a step towards her rectoration to her rank as Princess. The ambassador could but pray that there was no scorpion con-Boy no paris dix fois a la concabine, et que quant elle abertit il ne ley tint gueres astres propos, synon qu'il voyoit bien que Diez ne lay vouloit donner enfans masies. En s'es aliant, comme pour depri, il luy dit asses de mais grace que apres qu'elle soit relevés qu'il peristoit a alle. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, 20 Fév.

I Treuvent les ungs que cela soit procede de l'indisposition de se personne et inhabilité de porter enfant, et les autres dient que c'est pour craincte que ledict Roy ne la tracte comme la fene Royne, von mesmement le traya, et termes qu'its tiennent avec une demoiselle de Court nommée maistrenes Seymour, a la qualle, selon que dient plumeurs, il a fart ces jours de grans present. — Chapuys à l'Empereur, 10 Fév.

Pourvu que l'amour qu'elle luy portoit estoit trop plus grande . . . que calle de la foue Royne ; de sorte que le cueur luy rompoit quand elle veoit qu'il en symét des autres, duquel propos ledict Boy a este fort reary et en fait bien le cemblant, veu que ces jours de forts et bonne chiere il est iey, et laines l'antre a Greenwich le cu autrefeis ne le pouvoit abandemeer age house. ... Chaptys à l'Empereur, 20 Fév.

cealed beneath the honey. The King, so understood, had only waited to compel her to swear to the Statutes till the concubine had produced the prince, of whom both he and she had made sure. He advised her, in compliance with the Emperor's instructions, to offer, if a prince was actually born, to submit to her father's pleasure, and meantime to endeavour to please the lady in whose charge she was placed.

Anne Boleyn's overtures in the same direction the Princess had met, as we have seen, with the most determined coldness. She as little liked the advice of Chapuys, and her whole mind continued to be fixed upon her escape to the Continent.¹

Anne herself sought consolation for her calamity in fresh hopes for the future. She comforted the ladies who were weeping round her with telling them that it was perhaps for the best. The child which she had lost had been conceived in the late Queen's lifetime, and there might be a question of its legitimacy. No uncertainty would attach to the next.*

"She admits thus," observed Chapuys, "that there is a doubt about her bastard daughter."

"The King's new love affair with the lady I have already mentioned," he continued, "goes steadily forward, to the concubine's extreme rage. The King introduced the lady's brother into the privy chamber a fortnight ago. It is regarded as a good sign " that the matter will not be broken off."

About the same time Chapuys received a message from [►] Chapays & l'Empereur, Fév. 17.

L'on m'a dict que la concubine . . . consoloit ses Demoiselles qui pleuroient, leur disant que c'estoit pour le misula, car elle en seroit tant prus tost ensaincte, y que le fils qu'elle pourteroit ne seroit dubieux comme fast este icelle, estant conçeu du vivant de la Royne. — Chapoys à Granvelle, 25 Fév.

Les nouvelles amoure de ce Roy avec la demoyselle dont ny sydevant muript vont tousjours en avant a la grosse raige de la concubine ; et le diet Roy puis quanze jours mis en la chambre le frère de ladicte demokselle que l'on tient a bon sign pour la progres dasdicts amours. — Chapuys à Granvelle, 18 Mars.

Cromwell, begging for a private conversation with bluafter Mass, on the Eve of St. Matthias, February 29, at St.
Augustine's Church. Cromwell told him that great efforts were being made by Lord Wiltshire, Anne's father, and by others who had pensions from France, to induce the King to declare war against the Emperor. Both the King, and he and the country generally were very reluctant, and he trusted that Chapuys would assist him in removing the ground of difference between such old allies as England and the House of Burgundy.

Chapuys said that the King must retrace many of his past steps. He must submit to the Holy See, and must recognise the legitimacy of the Princess Mary — both these measures were indispensable preliminaries.

Cromwell answered that on these points the King would be hard to move. He was determined to maintain the independence of the English Crown. To acknowledge the Princess legitimate was to allow the supremacy of the Pope, and to this his master would never consent. He was willing, however, to assist the Emperor with men and money in bringing France to reason. He suggested—and Chapuys enclosed a curious fragment in Cromwell's hand embodying his proposal—that Charles should write private letters to the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and to the Duke of Richmond also, Henry's illegiumate son, who both in mind and body singularly resembled his father.¹

Charles himself now appears on the scene, replying particularly to the points which Cromwell had raised.

"The withdrawal of the King from the Church of Rome," he replied to Chapuys, "and the measures which he has taken in opposition to it, are points of great importance. He may find a difficulty in turning back. His pride may stand in the way. He may be ashamed of showing himself irresolute, both before the world and even before his own subjects, and he is obstinate in his own opinions. You may lay before him such considerations as you think most likely to weigh with him - the peril of his soul, the division, achism, and confusion in his realm, and the manifest danger should the Pope proceed to execute the consures already threatened, to pronounce him deposed, and to call on the kings and princes of Christendom to carry the decree into effect. Whatever comes of it, both he and his adherents cannot but be kept in continual anxiety, and although he may sustain his present course during his own life (which he cannot do without great peril and difficulty), he will inevitably leave the gravest calamities to those who come after him. Tell but that he will do far better to take measures himself for the safety of his realm in time. He can do it without difficulty, either by referring the questions at issue to the decision of the Council, or hy treating to myself to aegotiate for him with the Holy See. He may rely on me to settle matters as honourably and favourably for him as possible. If you can learn from him the terms to which he will agree, it will be all the better, for we shall gain time. And it is likely that he will be more willing to consent to a compromise than hind himself to submit either to the Council or to my arbitration. In every way this will be the best, for otherwise he will do all in his power to impeach the Council, or, though he consents to its meeting, will adhere to those who have separated from the Church, so that any general remedy will become more difficult. It will be easier to treat with him particularly beforehand, and I shall be better able to mediate with the Pope without scraple or jealousy. The points of which he accomplains are the sentence at Rome in the divorce cause. the private interests of England in the matter of annates, and the other claims preferred by the Holy See upon that realm. The first may be comprehended in some general arrangement to be made for the Princess: 1 the annates can be moderated, with a declaration limiting the Pope's remaining pretentions; and as to the authority of the Church of England, you can persuade the King that some appointment shall be taken to his own honour, and the profit and the welfare of the realm.2 In all your communications you must speak as of yourself, in the form of interrogatories, till you know in what the King will persist. I can agree to nothing to the diminution or prejudice of the Roman Church without the consent of the Pope. You may only undertake for me that I will do all that I can in his interests. If you find him obstinate you will not fail. notwithstanding, to accertain his intention on the other points. Provided I am not to be obliged to sustain or support him in his errors, I am content, rather than break off the treaty, to leave these matters in abevance, to be settled hereafter. As to my cousin, you must avoid by all possible means consenting to or doing anything by which the honour of the late Queen, my sunt, shall be touched."

Duques Henry de Richmond, Thomas de Norfolk, Charles de Suffolk — ad quem si dignabitur scribers Cassar non arit men judado abs re . . . Id escus in optimam partens interpretabitur pater quem non magio corporis incomentis quem animi dotibus referm certam est.

١

1

² Sera plus difficile pour la boute du monde et mesme de me subjete.

So far as the Church was concerned, there were no signs that Henry thought of retracing his steps. Parliament had again met, and had passed the Act for the suppression of the smaller monastenes. Another marriage for the King was still being talked of, but as the Emperor's intentions were still uncertain, Wolsey's original project was revived, and there was an idea of applying to Francis for the hand of a French princess. Cromwell was supposed to have a Il suppose this to be Charles's meaning. His words are: Quant on premier, il pourroit ceaser an venant a traicter de ce que concerne la Princesse nostre cousine.

Et numi quant à l'anctorité de l'Egliss Anglicane l'un pourroit persunder au Boy que la chose se appointureit à son homseur, proufit et bien du Royaulme.

I'Empereur à Chapuye, 26 Mare.

^{*} Il se brayolt de qualque nouveaux mariage pour le Roy qui conformelt avacques . . . [word illegible] de France. . . . Les Messionts de la Court discovent que le Roy fusse soliciter a mariage la file de France a ceste co-mains. — Chaptuya à l'Empereux, 1 Avril, 1548.

hand in this project; and at the end of March, the Marchioness of Exeter, the Countess of Kildare, Lord Montague, and others, informed Chapuys that Anne Boleyn and the minister were on had terms in consequence.

To discover if there was any truth in these rumours, Chapuys called on Cremwell, and told him that he had omitted of late to visit him in consequence of Queen Anne's threats to take his head off. Cromwell, he said, deserved a more gracious mistress, better able to appreciate his inestimable aervices to his master.

Cromwell affected to be pleased. He replied that he was but too well aware of the instability of human things, especially of the favour of Courts. He had ever before his eyes, he said, the fate of his predecessors, and had made his account to fare as they had fared. If the worst came he would arm himself with patience, and leave the rest to God. He then went on to express his regret for the part which he had taken in advancing the King's marriage with Anne. He had seen the King to be bent upon it, however, and all that he had done had been to show him the means by which it could be brought about. The King seemed now inclined to seek the society of other ladies, but he trusted that there would be no fresh changes, and that his master would now continue to live with her honourably and chastely.

There was something peculiar in Cromwell's manner. Chapuys looked at him keenly. He was leaning against a window, with one hand over his mouth, whether by accident or to conceal a smile Chapuys did not know. One thing, Cromwell continued, the French might assure themselves of, that if the King intended to take another wife he would not go to look for her in Paris.

Chapuys was closing the letter in which he was forwarding this information, when the Marchioness of Exeter sent to tell him that the King having been lately in London and Chapays & l'Empereur, 1 Avril.

I Le Roy sen maistre fut encorse incline à festeyer et servir Dames.

Mistress Seymour at Greenwich, the King had sent her a purse full of sovereigns, with a letter which she had kissed and had returned unopened to the bearer. She had thrown herself on her knees, and had bliden the messenger entreat the King to remember that she was the child of honest parents, with an unstained name, that she valued nothing so much as her honour, and that she would not wound it for any reward that would be offered to her. If he wished to make her a present, she begged him to keep it till God sent him some one to marry.

Jane Seymour, it is here necessary to my, had been a lady-in-waiting to Queen Catherine. She was deeply attached, as will be seen hereafter, to the Princess Mary. She was herself strongly Imperialist, and supposing the charges against Anne of having endeavoured to destroy Mary were well grounded, she is likely to have shared the feeling of all the Imperialist party about her. Like them, she probably regarded Anne as no better than the King's mistress, and felt no scruple whatever therefore in desiring to see him married to another woman. Whether she sought the position for herself may be uncertain. There is so sign at all that she hesitated to accept it.

"The Marchionem tells me," continued Chapuys, " that the King's inclination for Mistress Seymour was marvellously increased by her answer. He said that she was a virtuous woman, and that she might understand that his intentions were strictly honourable, he would only speak with her in future in the presence of one of her relations. He has removed Cromwell from a room to which he had private access by a gallery, and has placed there the lady's eldest brother with his wife, so that he can see her when he pleases."

I Qu'elle estoit issue de bone et bonorables parens anns nul reproche, et qu'elle n'avoit plus grande richesse en ce mende que sen henneur, le quel pour mille . . . elle se vouldroit blesser, et que s'il luy vouloit faire quelque present d'argent sile luy suppliest que ce fust quand Dieu luy suveyoit quelque party de mariage.

"Mistress Seymour has been well indoctrinated by the greater part of the King's friends, who hate the concubine, that she must show him no sort of complaisance unless as his wife. On this she is fully resolved. She has been advised also to tell the King hardily that he is living 'n unexampled abomination, that not a creature regards his marriage as legitimate.\text{\text{\text{}}} When she has opened the matter there will be others to tell him the same, provided he obliges them to speak on their outh and on their loyalty.\text{\

"The Marchioness says also that I or some one else on the part of your Majesty should lend a hand to the affair; and, indeed, I think it will be well if we can bring it to effect, as well for the assurance of the person of the Princess, as to apply a remedy to the heresias here, of which the concubine is the cause and the chief nurse, and also to extricate the King from his present abominable and worse than incestuous connection. The Princess will be well pleased also, although she may lose the succession by the birth of a male heir."

St. George's Day was now approaching. A series of fittes was projected at Greenwich, which were to extend from the 20th of April to the beginning of May. The Emperor's ambassador was invited, and was received with marked attention. Cromwell took an opportunity of privately repeating to him how anxious the King was for a return to cordiality with his master. He went so far as to hint that a reconciliation with Rome was not wholly impossible. Lord Rochford said something polite to him on the advantages of the Imperial alliance. Chapuys, though he abhorred him, received his advances smoothly, saying that he trusted he would leud his assistance in a matter of so much importance to Christendom. Rechford turned the talk upon Lutheranism, but Chapuys evaded the dangerous subject.

¹ La quelle est bles endoctrinée de la plus part des privée du Roy qui hayent la concubine, qu'elle ne doyt en sorte du monde complanar à la fantasie du Roy, si n'est par tiltre de mariage, de quoy elle est toute resolue. Il luy est aussi conscillée qu'elle die bard-ment au Roy quelle abhominacion à toute exemple sen mariage, et que mai le tient pour legitime.

The decipher of this sentence is vary obscure. I read the words: kit an pointe qu'elle proposeru indicte affaire il ny doit avoir que qui proposeruient les masmes, pourven que : Roy les constrainge sur le jurement et fidalité que luy out.

Chapays à l'Empereur, 1 Avril.

Cromwell then came again to him with a message from Henry. The King, he said, would be gratified if he would pay a visit to "the concubine" and give her the kiss of peace. He left it, however, to Chapuys' pleasure. Chapuys replied that his pleasure was the King's—the King had only to command him. He thought, however, that for various respects, which at another time he would explain to his Majesty, such a visit would just then be out of place.

The King took his snawer in good part. Mass was said, to which Chapuys was conducted by Rochford. When the King entered there was a rush of people to see how Anne would receive Chapuys. She made him a deep obsistance, which he returned, and she passed on. When the service was over, the King and a number of the peers retired to dine in Anne's spartments. Chapuys might have followed, but declined; Lord Rochford conducted him to the Presence Chamber, where he dined with the courtiers.

In the afternoon he had an interview with Henry, who received him bonnet in hand, and was profuse in his expressions of good-will towards the Emperor. The King, however, was most decided in refusing to have any further dealings with the Pope. Neither his relations with the Pope, he said; nor the position of the Princess, were any concern of the Emperor's. He persistently declined to recognise the Princess' legitimacy, but was otherwise gratious, and spoke at great length on the condition of Europe, with which he recemed to be wholly absorbed.

Whatever else might have been intended, there had been

That I suppose to be the meaning of "visitor at below is concabine."
Chapuye 4 PEmpereur, 31 Ayril.

evidently, up to this time, no thought of charging Anne with personal criminality. Politics was the foremost subject with every one. The fortunes of the unhappy woman who was about to be the object of so tremendous an accusation were of interest only so far as her overthrow or her retention of her place beside the King would affect the balance of political power. A decent excuse for divorcing her was being eagerly looked for by the party which had been putting forward Jane Seymour. One of them had consulted Stokesly, the Bishop of London. The Bishop had answered warily that he would give his opinion to no one but the King, nor to the King, until he had discovered which way the King's inclination lay. He would not risk the effects of Anne's revenge if there was a chance of her remaining in favour.¹

The Bishop, Chapuys added, had been one of the chief instruments of the first divorce. He now repented of it with all his heart, and would be more willing to further the second, the concubine and all her race being such abominable Lutherans.

Could Henry have made up his mind to restore the Papal authority, the divorce of Anne would have presented no difficulty; and this, perhaps, was the meaning of a few words which Chapuys wrote to Granvelle about Cromwell. Cromwell, he said, had done everything in his power to induce the King to meet the Emperor's wishes. He had risked Henry's displeasure by the freedom with which he had spoken to him, and had taken to his bed for vexation at finding him so detestably obstinate."

The difficulty was to declare the second marriage null

Le frère de M. de Montague me dit en dinant que l'Evesque de Londres avoit aste interrogué el ce Roy pourroit habandonner la dicte concubine, et qu'il n'en avoit point voule dire son advis ne le direit au personne de monde que au seul Roy; et avant que ce faire il vousdroit espier la fantasie dudict Roy; veuillant innuyz que le dict Roy pourroit laisser ladicta soncubine — toutefois congnoissant l'inconstance et mutabilite de sediet Boy, il ne voudroit mettre en dangier de ladicte concubine.

Chapsys & Granvelle, 21 Avril.

without acknowledging the validity of the first — Henry, it seems, having made up his mind that come what would the Papal power should never be reinstated.

It has been seen that Anne had surrounded herself with the most bitter enemies. There were the orthodox, who hated her and her family as the patrons of the Latherans. There were the Imperialists, who detested her as French. There were the peers, whom, like the Duke of Norfolk, she had offended by her arrogance in the days of her favour. There were those who believed that she had poisoned Queen Catherine; and there were others who, with better reason, were assured that she had advised the King to execute his daughter. Their tongues had been tied while she was supported by Henry's affection. Like the Bishop of London, they had waited till they were assured that she had lost it. But no sooner was it whispered that he was really auxious to be rid of her, than the accumulated malice of months and years, truths, fictions, exaggerations, blended and whirled together, were ready prepared to burst out. She had been miserably imprudent. She had allowed gentlemen about the Court to be dangerously intimate with her. She had talked to them, by her own subsequent acknowledgment, of the King's infirmities, and of their hopes of her hand when he should be gone. She had jested, as will be seen hereafter, with her brother's wife on a yet more perilous subject. Whether she had done worse may be reasonably doubted; but trifles such as these, seen through the medium of ill-will, might easily be magnified into damning evidence of guilt.

The first discovery was her early love affair with the young Earl of Northumberland. Some said she had been engaged to him—an engagement under the Canon law boing sufficient to invalidate a subsequent union with another person—some that she had been actually married to him. Northumberland denied it when questioned, out he could hardly do otherwise without exposing himself to a serious charge. Witnesses were forthcoming ready to prove the story; and some real past connection may, perhaps, have been the cause of the bitterness with which, as we have seen, Northumberland regarded Anne.

I Quelquigs de son conseil luy domaint entendre qu'il ne spaireit sepaser de la dicte concubine sans tantement confirmer non seu lement le prunier mariage, mais aussi que plus il rumit l'austorite du Pape. — Chapuys à l'Émpereur, 3 Mai.

The King had determined to act upon this evidence. But either something of a darker character was now really suspected, or a mere divorce was insufficient to satisfy the concentrated malice which she had provoked.

There was a Garter vacant by the death of some French nobleman. It was given to the Master of the Horse, Sir Nicholas Carew, though Anne had laboured hard to obtain it for Rochford. Carew, though Anne was his cousin, resented her interference, and with the rest of the conspirators renewed his entreaties to Jane Seymour to use her influence to precipitate her fall. On the 25th of April, Carew and certain others of the Household sent word to the Princess Mary that she might be of good cheer, for her adversaries would very shortly be disposed of. The King was as weary of the concubine as he could possibly be.

We now some to the 2d of May, the day on which the cloud broke in a form so terrible and apparently so unexpected.

"Your Majosty," Chapuys wrote to the Emperor, "will

- 1 Ores que la dicte crime ne fet este descouvert, ce Roy, a ce que j'ay ces jours este advertys de bonace et certaines personnes, avoit delibere la habendonner, car il y avoit des tesmoings tous conformes testifians que mariage avoit passe neuf ans . . . este fait et . . . charnellement entre elle et le cente de Northumberland. Chapuye à l'Empereur, 2 Mai.
- "No tiendre audict escayer que satiete concubine quelque courine qu'elle n'en solt ne solt desargemnée, et un cesse de consuller maistresse Seymour avec autres conspirateurs pour luy faire une resse. Et n'y a point quatre jours que luy et certaine de la Charabre out mandé dire à le princesse qu'elle feit bonne chere et que bresvement sa contre partie mettroit de bière un sée, car la Roy estoit deja si triet avec . . . et ensuye de la dicta concubine qu'il n'estoit possible de plus. Chapaye à l'Empereue, 32 Avril. I une not sure that I have correctly read the worde printed in tealies.

TOE, IL

remember what I wrote to you at the commencement of the past month, touching what had passed between myself and Mr. Cromwell on the divorce of the King from the concubine. I ascertained the pleasure of the Princess on the subject. She desired that I should do my best to further the matter, especially for the konour and discharge of the conscience of the King her father. She cared not the least in the world that the King might [now] have lawful heirs who might deprive her of the succession, while for the honour of God she pardoned all the world from her heart for what had been done against herself and against the late Queen her mother. I have [in consequence] used such means as seemed convenient to set the affair forward. both with Mr. Cromwell and with many other persons, of which so far I have not written to your Majesty till I saw how the affair would go. It has turned out, in my opinion, far better than any one could have anticipated, and with the greatest ignominy, by the justice and judgment of God. The concubine has been taken in the open daylight from Greenwich to the Tower of London. She was conducted thither by the Dake of Norfolk, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Vice-Chamberlain, and she has been left there alone. with four ladice to attend upon her. The report goes that it is for adultery, which she has long carried on with a musician of her chamber, who this morning was sent to the Tower also. Master Norris, one of the persons most intimate with the King, has been committed for not having revealed what was going on; six hours later three other gentlemen; and three or four hours after his sister, Lord Rochford was committed also."

With this hurriedly-written note Chapuys' confidential servant George was despatched to Brussels. Lord Howard wrote at the same time to Granvelle, saying that he understood "the concubine" had been surprised in bed with the sing's organist.

¹ J.a quelle volunts estoit que deusse tentr main audiet affaire et principalement pour l'homseur et descharge de conscience du Roy sen pere ; et qu'elle ne se soucioit en façon du monde que ledict Roy son Pure passit avoir heim lagitimes que luy cetassent la succession.

Granvelle received Lord Howard's letter before the arrival of Chapnys' messenger. The Emperor wrote immediately to tell Chapnys to take advantage of the opportunity to press forward the alliance. He sent the letters which Cromwell had recommended to the three Dukes. "If Lord Howard's news be true," Charles said, "it is probable that as God has permitted this woman's damnable life to be discovered, the King will be more inclined to treat with as, and there will be better ground for arranging what concerns our cousin the Princess. But you must use all your skill to prevent the King from inclining to a marriage with France. He must rather choose one of his own subjects—either her for whom he has already shown an inclination or some other."

So far the Emperor had written when Chapuys' servant arrived. "George has just come," Charles continued, "and I have learnt from him the certainty of these news touching the concubine. We suppose that the King will put her to death, as she has well deserved, with all the partners of her guilt, and that, being of an amorous complexion, and being, as he has always alleged or pretended, decirous of a male child, he will now take another wife. Overtures will certainly be made to him on the side of France. You will andeavour, as of yourself or with Cromwell, to further a marriage for him with the Infanta of Portugal, the daughter of my sister the Queen of France, who has a sottlement by will of 400,000 ducats. You will propose at the same time another marriage, between the Princess Mary and the Infant of Portugal, Don Louis, my brother-in-law. You will give them to understand that these alliances will be very convenient to efface part unpleasantness, and cement a union between myself, the King, Portugal, and our realms and countries. You will indicate how advantageous such an alliance will prove to the realm of England should a prince be the fruit of it; and for this we may reasonably hope, the Infanta being young and well nurtured."

¹ Le viscoute Howard a secript a Sr de Granvelle que au mesme instant Il avoit entendu de bou hou que la concubine dudict Roy avoit este surprise senat de avec s'organiste du dict Roy.

"M. l'Ambassadeur, my good brother and friend," wrote Granvelle to Chapuys simultaneously, "I have received your letter by your man George; I have heard his commission. You have done well to advertise us of what has passed touching the 'concubine,' which is indeed music of a high sort, and worthy of laughter." God is revealing the iniquity of those from whom so many mischiefs have arisen, and since it is so we must make our profit and conduct matters the best we can, according to the Emperor's instructions. Use all diligence and all possible dexterity. Besides the immense advantage which will follow, both public and private, you will yourself thus obtain the reward of your true and faithful services."

A third letter followed three days later from the Emperor, repeating his offers with still greater urgency; and it is noticeable that in no one of these despatches is any condition made or any stipulation hinted at for a reconciliation with the Papacy. Charles perhaps expected that it would follow as a matter of course, and that the less he said about it the better. It is clear further, that although the Emperor was aware of the conspiracy against Anne, which had been going forward throughout the spring, he must have looked upon it with as much satisfaction as the Princess Mary, and that not a suspicion crossed his mind that the "concubine" was being unfairly dealt with.

Meanwhile Cromwell had been intrusted with the duty of investigating the particular accusations. He told Chapuys afterwards that it had caused him the greatest distress.

L'Empereur à Chapaya, 15 Mai.

I Qui à la verite est une marique de baulte genre et digue de rire.

M. Granvelle à l'Ambassadeur de l'Angleterre, 15 Mai.

He need the remarkable expression, that the vexation and annoyance which he had felt at the King's language to Chapuye at Greenwich had set him upon inquiring into the business, and that one of the things which had roused his suspensons had been a prophecy made in Flanders threatening the King with a complicacy from parties nearest about his person. He praised highly the sense, the spirit, and the heart, both of the concubine and her brother.

Imperfect as the evidence still remains, it is unfair to build theories on casual observations which themselves come to us at second-hand. Cromwell's words, however, as they stand, suggest misgivings. He had quarrelled with Anna, and she had threatened him with the scaffold. He had been active in promoting her divorce. He had recommended the King, as a step towards it, to accept the Emperor's overtures, even though they involved a reconciliation with the Pope, and the King had angrily refused. If Anne maintained her place, his own situation could not fail to be most dangerous; and if he had been really playing a false game, the commendations of Anne and her brother, otherwise so much out of place, become intelligible. That he was an unsurupulous politician has been seen already when be apoke to Chapuys "like Caiaphas." It is fair to add, however, that we know nothing of him which would justify a suspicion that he would be guilty of so hideous a crime as knowingly to forge a charge of adultary against a woman whom he knew to be innecent.

At any rate, the case against Anne and "her accomplices" rapidly assumed shape. She was accused of having committed herself with Mark Smeton the musician, with Sir Henry Norris, Sir William Brereton, and Sir Francis Weston. She was charged besides with incest with her brother. Time, place, carcumstances, all were given, and something must have been produced in the way of proof. There were grand juries and petty Juries. A special commission was appointed to try the four gentlemen. All the judges sat upon it, and among others the Earl of Wiltshire, Anne's father. Anne herself and Lord Rochford were tried by the Peers. Mark Smeton pleaded guilty. He was treated in the Tower with exceptional severity, which does not look as if he had been bribed to lie. He had confessed from the first, and adhered to his confession to the last. The rest said they were innocent, but their statements cariously varied.

³ Lay swelt este l'autorité de descouvrir et parachever leedictes affaires d'itelle concubine, en quey il avoit en une merveilleuse peine; et que sur le desplesur et couroux qu'il avoit en sur le responce que la Roy son Maitre m'avoit denné le tiere jour de Fanques il se meet à fantamen de enquerr la dicte affaire; et que une des choses que l'avoit mis en soubçon et anime pour s'enquerir du cas avoit asse une prognantication faices en Flandes, la quelle menaçoit ce Roy d'une comprentien des plus proches de sa personne, et sur ce il me lous grandement le seus esprit et auur de la d'eta consulène et de sen frere. — Chapays à l'Emperson, & Jum.

Chapuys' account of the trials is the most circumstantial which has come down to us. It is long, but its extreme interest forbids compression.

A letter of the Emperor's, written before he had heard of Anne's arrest, arrived a day or two after it. Chaptys had been ill, but he sent a copy to Cromwell, who expressed himself delighted at the Emperor's expressions of good-will towards England, and gave hopes that the feeling would be reciprocated on the part of his master. Things could not, be said, be in better train than they were, especially through what had happened in the matter of the concubine. He reminded Chaptys of what he had said to him on the Eve of St. Matthias, when he had foretold what was likely to happen. He professed great anxiety for Chaptys' convalencence, that when the concubine and her accomplices were despatched, he might come to Court and carry out his negotiations.

"Sire," Chapays' letter continued, "no one could have imagined the delight which the people are everywhere exhibiting, not so much for the ruin of the concubine as for the hope of the reinstatement of the Princess. So far the King shows no inclination to replace ker. The Council have twice moved him about it, but he remains obstinate I learn from good authority that in a conversation between Jane Seymour and the King about their approaching marriage, before the concubine was arrested, the lady proposed to him to bring back the Princess to the Court. The King told her that she was a fool. She ought rather, he said, to think of the position of the children which they might expect for tuemselves, and not of the elevation of the other, She answered that in soliciting the restoration of the Princoss she believed she was consulting the good of the King, of herself, of her children, should she have any, and of all the realm; without it neither the Emperor nor the English nation would be satisfied, and nothing was to be looked for but ruin. She speaks fair, and I will use all means in my power to keep her to her purpose. I hope in three days to speak to the King and the Council. I will also communicate about it with a part of the Lords who have been summoned hither to a meeting of Parliament. The concubine's little bastard will, I believe, be excluded from the succession; the King means Parliament to invite him to marry again. To conceal the affection which he bears to the Lady Seymour he keeps her seven miles distant, in the house of the Master of the Horse, and he says in public that he does not desire to re-enter the married state unless his subjects constrain him.

"Sire, the same evening on which the concubine was taken to the Tower, the Duke of Richmond going, according to the custom in England, to ask his father's blessing before retiring to rest, the King burst into tears, saying that he and his sister, meaning the Princess, must thank God for baving escaped the hands of that accurred and venomous earlot, who had intended to poison them. From these words it would appear that he knows something."

I Sire, le mesme soir que le dicte concubine fut moute a la Tour, allant le Dus de Richmond donner je bon soir su Rey son pure et lay demander le

"Sire, on the 12th of this month there were condemned as traitors Mester Norvis, a gentleman of the King's privy chamber! Master Weston, who used to alsop with the King; and Master Brereton, a gentleman of the chamber also, of whom I wrote by my man to your Majesty. The variet, sire, is the only one that has confessed. He admitted that he had been with the concubine three times. The rest were condemned on presumption and certain indications, without proof or valid confession."

"On the 15th the concubine and her brother were condemned for treason by all the principal lords in England.
The Duke of Norfolk pronounced centence, and I am told that the Earl of Wiltshire was ready to assist at the judgment as he had done at the condemnation of the other four.
The said 'putain' and her brother were not taken to Westminster like the other criminals, but were tried at the Tower. There was, however, no secret made of it, for over two thousand persons were present. The principal charge against her was that she had cohabited with her brother and her other accomplices; that a promise had passed between her and Norris that she would marry him after the King's decease—a proof that they desired his death—and that she had received certain medals from Norris.... (four words illegible in MS.) that she had caused the late benediction à la constante d'Angleterre, le diet Roy se print a lermoyer, dient que luy et sa sœur, entendant la Princesse, estoient bien tenux a Dieu d'avoir eschappe les mains d'icelle manidate et venificque putals qu'avoit deliberé les faire empoisonner, dont il fauit dire que le s'et Roy en apavoit quelque abose.

The empicion, whether groundless or well grounded, was not confined to the King. The Duke of Richmond died in the summer, and a contemperary chroniclet, otherwise well inclined to Anne Boleyn, and who gives more particulars about her fall than any other English writer of the time, easy: :—

"It was thought that he was privily potented by the means of Queen Anne and her brother Lord Rochford, for he pined inwardly in his body long before he died. God knoweth the truth thereof "—MS. belonging to Lord Hearly Percy, about to be published by the Camden Society.

² Per presumption et aucune ludices reas preuve ny emplemien valide.

Queen to be poisoned, and that she had intended to do the same to the Princess.¹

"To all these charges the gave an absolute denial, and replied to each with a sufficiently coloured answer. She admitted, indeed, that she had given money to Weston, as the had also done to various other young gentlemen. It was objected to her and to her brother, that they had mocked at the King and at his dress, and that she had shown in many ways that the had no love for the King, but was weary of him."

"The brother was charged with having cobabited with her, on presumption; having on one occasion been a long time alone with her, and from certain other trifling follies. He replied to all so well that many persons present were ready to bet ten to one that he would be acquitted; " especially because no witnesses were produced either against him or against her, as is the custom when the prisoner denies the crime of which he is accused.

"I must not omit that, among other things, it was objected to Lord Rochford, as a crime, that his sister the 'putain' had told his wife 'que le Roy n'estoit habille en eas de soy avec femme, et qu'il n'avoit ny vertu ny puissance.' They had not wished to allow this charge to get abroad. It was shown to Rochford in writing, with a protest that it was not to be read aloud. But he immediately declared the matter, to the great annoyance of Cromwell and several others, who were unwilling that a suspicion should be engendered to the prejudice of the offspring that the King pretends to have."

¹ Qu'elle avoit fait empelssonner la feue Royne et machiné de faire la

Colleré — plaus ble.

^{*} Il luy fut aussy objecte et au frere annay qu'ils estoieut mocqué ju Boy et de ses habillements ; et qu'elle en plusieum façons demonstroit na tymer ledict Roy ains estre ennuyé de luy.

⁴ An tout il respondit si bien que plusieurs des sesistans voulurent garger dix pour ung qu'il seroit absolu.

⁵ An grand despit de Crouswell et aueungs autres qui na vouldroient en

"It was objected also to him, that he had used words in which he had expressed a doubt whether his sister's daughter was the King's child or not."

"They were tried separately and did not see each other. The concubins was condemned first. When she heard her sentence, which was to be burnt or to lose her head, at the King's pleasure, she said that death was welcome to her: her chief sorrow was that the gentlemen, who were innocent and loyal to the King, were to die for her sake. She begged only for a short respits to dispose her conscience.

"The brother, when he heard his sentence, said, that since die he must, he would not any longer maintain his innocence. He acknowledged that he had well deserved death," and desired that the King would allow his debta to be paid out of his property.

"Although all the world here is delighted at the execution of the harlot, there are few persons who do not murmur at and consider most strange the forms which have been observed in the process and condemnation of the others. The King is variously spoken of, nor will people be more appeared when they know what has passed and is passing between him and Mistress Jane Seymour. It is remarked already that the King, though he has received an great an injury, has been in the highest spirits since the harlot's arrest. He goes continually with ladies to banquets at this place and that. Sometimes he remains till past midnight, returning by the river. He is accompanied the greater part of the time with musical instruments, and with the singers of his privy chamber. Men interpret it as mean-cest endroit s'engendreit suspicion qui pourroit prejudiquer a la lignes que le dict Roy pretend avoir.

Il lay fut many objects qu'il avoit ou semé quelques parolles par lesquelles il mectoit en doubte si la fille de sa sœur estoit fille du Boy ou non.

Le frere apres es condemnation d't que puisque failloit qu'il mourut il ne vauloit plus soubstenir son innocence, ains confessoit qu'il avoit bien deservy la mort, seulement supplicit audiet Roy veuloir permectre que de ses biens fuseut payés ses debtes qu'il nomme.

mg that he is delighted at being quit of his lean old wicked baggage, with hope of a fresh start.

"He supped lately with a number of ladies in the house of the Bishop of Carlisle. The Bishop came the next day to tell me that he had been desperately happy there. The Bishop said, too, that, among other things, the King informed him that he had long foreboded the issue of these affairs, and that . . . some time age he had composed a tragedy, which he had brought with him, drawing, at the same time, out of his bosom a small written in his own hand. The Bishop did not read it. Possibly it contained certain ballads which he had composed, and which the concubine and her brother were gravely charged with having ridiculed.

"Sire, three days after the imprisonment of the concubine, the Princess was removed from her late residence. She was very honourably attended, as well by the attendants of the little bastard as by many other gentlemen who came to her of themselves. Numbers of her old servants and ladies went at the news to seek her. Her governess would have allowed them to remain, but at my advice she has declined to retain any one about her person, save such as shall be appointed by the King her father.

"One of my chief fears for the Princess is, that when the Estates call upon the King to reinstate her in her rights and titles, he will not consent till she has first sworn to the Statutes annulling the first marriage and the authority of the Pope. In this, I think, she will be hard to move.

. . . Your Majesty will let me know your pleasure in the matter.

"Sire, this day Lord Rochford and the other four gentlemen were beheaded in front of the Tower, in spite of the exertions made by the Bishop of Tarbes, the French Ambassador-in-Ordinary, and M. d'Inteville, who arrived the day before yesterday, to save one of them named Weston. The concubine saw them executed from the windows of the Tower, to enhance her misery and grief. The Lord Rochford declared himself innocent of everything with which he was charged, although he confessed that he had deserved death for having contaminated himself with the new sects of religion, and for having infected many others. On this account, he said, God had justly punished him. He prayed all the world to keep clear of these heresics and to adhere to the true faith, and his words will cause the conversion and recovery of innumerable souls.

¹ Sentagt fort a l'interpretation de plusieurs la jouymence d'estre quicte de maigre vieille et meschante bagage, avec espeir de rechargement.

2 Chapuys sent afterwards enother account in Species of Lord Rockford's words, very different from his first version: —

El Condo do Rockford hisó una havenga bien Catellon, diciendo al prable que no vena a predicarios entes para ser mundero y openplo, confesendo ses faltas y percadus adeianta do Dios y el Rey se Sulor — declarando no ser menester las declarar las casese perqua habia ado condenado, perque se n'abrian placer en cyrio; natas demandar merced y pardona do sus effenses à Dios y al Rey ya tedas les otros a quien pudese haber becho tent, y que da buan corazon como al percloanha a cada une, cogando que ninguno ne quieles seguir las vanidades deste mundo ny trampas de Corte, las cuales le habian traydo à tal fin y verguança en que se hallaba — y se hubiens seguido las doctrimas Evangelicas las cuales muchas venes habia leydo, ne hubiera caydo en tal perigro, porque mas vale el que bien hace que es que bien los y que finalmente perdomaba a todos aquellos que le habian contenciado a la muerra, regando quascent regar a livos por en altera.

There is a deplicate of this account at Bressele. The version in Lord. Energy Percy's MS, nearly resembles it :

Masters all. I am come hither not to preach and make a sermen, but in die, as the low bath found me, and to the low I submit me, desiring you all, and specially you, my meeters of the Court, that you will treat on God specially, and not on the vanities of the world, for if I had so done I think I had been allow as yo be now. Also I desire you to bein to the setting forth of the true word of God. And whereas I am slandered by it I have been dilignest to read it and set it forth truly 1 but if I had been an dilignest to observe it, and done and lived thereafter, as I was to read it and set it forth, I had not come herete. Wherefore I beseech you all to be workers, and live thereafter, and not to read it and live not thereafter. As for more effects, it cannot prevail you to been them that I die here for, but I beseech God that I may be an example to you all, and that all you may hewere by me. And heartly I require you all to pray for me, and to forgive me if I have of eached you, and I forgive you all, and God move the King.

"The concubine will certainly be executed to-morrow, or at latest on Friday. The King, I think, is impatient that it is not already done. The day before she was condemned, he sent Sir Nicholas Carew and some other gentlemen to fetch Mistress Seymour. They brought her within a mile of the palace, where she is splendidly rerved by the officers of the royal kitchen, and is magnificently dressed. A lady, a relation of hers, who dined with her on the day of the sentence, told me that a message estme from the King to her in the morning that by three o'clock he would send her word that the concubine was condemned. This he did by Master Bryan, whom he despatched with all speed. There is not the slightest doubt that he will marry the said Mistress Seymour; some believe that the contracts and promises have already passed.

"So far, sire, I wrote yesterday, but I delayed my despatch for a day that I might be able to advertise your Majesty for certain of the concubine's execution. It was done at nine o'clock in the morning inside the Tower. There were present the Chancellor, Master Cromwell, and many others of the King's Council, and a large concourse of English subjects besides. Foreigness were not admitted. It is said that although the bodies and heads of those decapitated the day before yesterday have been already buried, the concubine's head will be set upon the bridge, at least for a time. She confessed and communicated yesterday, expecting that she was then to have died. No one ever showed better inclination for death than she; she even pressed those who had her in charge to make haste with it;

We have here evidently two different versions of the same words, and both are confirmed by a friend of Norris and Bourston named Constantyre, who said that he was utterly incredulous of the guilt of any of the parties "till he heard them speak at their deaths, when is a manner all confessed except Norris, who said almost nothing."

After all the insight which Chapuye' letters give us into this extraordinary story, it remains remarkable that not Smeton only but all the others died without declaring themselves innocent, and virtually acknowladging that for some cause of other they were justly punished.

and when the order came to defer the execution till to-day, she showed much disappointment; she said she was in good state and well disposed for teath, and she prayed the Governor of the Tower, for the honour of God, that since it was so to be, he would beg the King to let her be despatched incontinently. The lady who had the care of her sent me secret word that both before and after she had received the Holy Sacrament, the concubine assured her, on the damnation of her soul, that she had never sinned against the King in the misuse of her body."

By the same post Chapuys wrote also to Glanvelle, adding other particulars.

"Two other gentlemen," he said, "have been arrested on the same charges, and it is thought that there will be many more. The King declares that he believes more than a hundred have had to do with her. There never was prince or person who has more displayed his horns or paraded them with greater show of satisfaction."

The King adhered, notwithstanding the disclosures and their fearful consequences, to his intended divorce. Believing, or affecting to believe, that he had been shamefully outraged, he determined that the offspring of the unhappy woman should have no legitimate claims upon him. Such a measure, indeed, if causes had been really found to invalidate the marriage, was politically necessary. The divorce was pronounced. The grounds of it were not made public.

"I have just learnt," Chapuys wrote, "that yesterday the Archbishop of Canterbury declared and formally pronounced the daughter of the concubing to be Master Nor-ra's bastard, and not the daughter of the King. This will remove an obstacle in the way of the Princess, who, I hope, whatever difficulties have been hitherto made, will be now proclaimed the true heir of the Crown, not as born of a lawful marriage, but as legitimate, nevertheless, propter bonam fidem parentum.

La dame qui la en en gardo m'a envoyé dire en grand secret que ladicte concubine avant et apres la reception du Sainet Sacrement, luy affirma sur la damnation de son una qu'elle ne s'esteit meffaiet de seu corps envere le Boy. Chapuye à l'Empereur, 19 Mai.

² Le Roy a dit qu'il pensolt et creoit que plus de cent avoient en affaire a clie. . . . Vous ne vistes eneques prince ne autre personne qui manifecte plus ece cornes ne qui les pronots plus alegrement. Chapuya adda — Je vous layse pensor la cause. — Chapuya à Granvelle, 19 Mai.

"Others say that the Archbishop has decreed the marriage between the King and concubine invalid because the King had had connection with her sister, and since both he and she were aware of this impeachment, the good faith of the parents could not be invoked to legitimatize the bastard girl."

The foulness of the rumours increased every moment.

"Although," said Chapuys, "I attach no great importance to this; I must tell you that many think the greater part of these new Bishops ought . . . [a few words of the MS. illegible]. They say that the Bishops persuaded the concubine that 'confession' was not necessary, and that in consequence she became the bolder to continue in her detestable and abominable vices. They are persuaded, moreover, that according to the opinions of that sect, estoit loysible de demander syde et subside d'ailleurs, voyre vers see propres parens, quand le many n'estoit idone et sufficant pour entisfaire à la femme."

The Peers and the Council, who, as we have seen, had long been busy in private promoting the King's marriage with Jane Seymour, now formally requested him to accomplish it without delay. The Infanta of Portugal was offered to him on one side. M. d'Inteville and the Bishop of Tarbes pressed on his acceptance, as Charles had anticipated, the sister of the King of France. The King refused to see the French ambassador. He said he had already experienced in the concubine the effects of French breeding.

Chapeys à Granvelle, 19 Mai.

^{*} La Roy respondit qu'elle astoit trop . . , pour luy; et d'ailleurs qu'il twoit trop experimente en la dicte concubine que c'esteit de la neurriture de France. — Chapuye à l'Empereur, 6 Juin.

Cromwell affected to blush for his master's answer, but he said their proposals were but lost labour, for the King would never marry out of his own realm; and when Chapuys inquired why, he coolly answered that they could not punish a foreigner of high birth if she misconducted herself as they had punished the concubine.¹

Chapuys was startled. He replied, however, that these could be no fear of such a misfortune in ladies well hors and bred, as they had seen in the late Queen; and he said that he meant to persist, as opportunity should offer, in advancing the interests of the Infanta.²

With the political alliance Cromwell assured him that all would now go well. The death of the concubine had removed all obstructions, and the King, in deference to the wishes of the people, was prepared to declare in Parliament the Princess to be his heir. In the matter of marriage, however, it was, as he said, lost labour.

The morning after the execution, Jane Seymour was brought privately to the palace, where the preliminary contract was executed. The secret was kept for a few days, but rumours began to go abroad. It was whispered that the marriage had been contemplated while Anne was alive, and Chapays anticipated an expression of popular discontant. He was agreeably, or disagreeably, disappointed however. The seremony itself was private, but at Whitsuntide Queen Jane was installed in the palace, and received Chapuyr congratulations in a formal audience, while no sound was heard anywhere but of general, and by him, at least, unexpected estimation.

I Me dict que feelluy Bully de Troyes et l'autre Ambassadeur evoient proposes le mariage de l'eisade die de France avec ce Roy, mais que c'estoit peine perdue, car ce Roy ne se marieroit oncques hors de son Royaulme, et luy demandant raison peurquey il m'en dit avec asses mine assurance que se venant a meffaire de son corps une Royau estrangera que fut de grande sang et perentage, l'ou ne pourroit chitier et n'en faire quiete comme il aveit faict de la deraiere. — Chapuya à l'Empereur, è Juin.

C'estoit shore insredible du play sir que se peuple avoit de ce mariage.
 HAT

The Emperor had saked for a description of Jane.

"She is the sister," Chapays wrote to Granvelle, "of a certain Edward Seymour, and she has completed her twenty-fifth year. She is short, of no great beauty, and, as all the world says, not even tolerably pretty. She is fair complexioned, and rather pale than otherwise. Having been long about the Court, you may imagine that she knows how to conduct herself, and what it is to make such a marriage as this. The King is delighted, being relieved of the trouble, which, as it is said, the concubine caused him; it o'n ny vigueur ny vertu, at d'ailleurs on cas qu'elle soit pucelle. If they want a divorce, never fear, they will find witnesses in plenty. She is of no great experience, but she is perhaps clever, and they tell me she is proud and haughty. She has great affection and reverence for the Princess."

There is something more to tell, but we may page for a moment to review the ground.

Anne Boleyn, it is evident, had borne herself in her invidious position with much indiscretion. She had insulted the peers. She and her brother had estentatiously favoured the new, and as yet unpopular, opinions in matters of religion; and in their anxiety to rid themselves of their dangerous rivals, they had endeavoured to bring Queen Catherine and the Princess Mary to the scaffold under the Act of Supremacy. Chapays mentions this, not once only, or as a rumour, but in almost every letter for a whole year, circumstantially and positively. He gives the names of the persons from whom he drew his information, and they were persons with the best opportunity of knowing the truth. Indisputably, it was the general belief of the great families, and of Queen Catherine's friends about the Court, and there is no reason to doubt that the belief was well founded.

As a natural consequence, though probably without any foundation at all, when Queen Catherine died, her rival was believed to have poisoned her. It was believed also that she meant to poison Mary, and thus there is no longer a mystery in the formation of a party whose object was to separate her from the King, and if possible destroy her. The King himself had for some time been estranged from her -- we do not know the reasons. His fancy for Jane Seymour is first mentioned in January 1536. He had scarcely spoken ten times to Anne in the three preceding months, so that a fancy for another woman was not the only cause. The state of politics made another marriage desirable for him, and immediately that his own inclinations were discovered to be wavering, a powerful faction, supported by his favourite ministers, was at hand to encourage his discontent. After Anne's last miscarriage he made up his mind to divorce her, and the only question was of the means. Had he accepted the Emperor's overtures it would have been easy, but he was unexpectedly obstinate about Rome, and some other plan had to be discovered. There is no sign of any desire on the part of the King to charge her with misconduct towards himself since her marriage, or of any thought of doing more than divorce her; nor would he purchase a divorce at the price of submitting to the Pope. But the Imperial faction had gone too far to recede. Her connection with Lord Percy was discovered, or said to be discovered, and on this Chapuye said that action was to have been taken.

² Chapuya à Granvelle, 18 Mal.

rot. II.

34

At that instant appeared the accumulated charges of incest and adultery. Chapuys' letters do not fully explain them, but they explain the readiness with which they were believed. Lord Howard said that Smeton had been found in her bed. Had this been so it would have been proved upon her trial. But Smeton was with her, as she herself admitted, on the last of April; and Smeton confessed his guilt and hers. The two things may have been connected or may not. The guilt may have been real, but also reasons may be imagined for his having lied. In the account in the Boya de Secretis the lovers are said to have been jealous of each other, and Smeton (it is but a conjecture) seeing Norris or Weston more favoured than himself, may have entangled himself in stories from which he could not afterwards extricate himself. The other points proved against her of levity, folly, indecency, may have been well founded, and yet are all compatible with substantial innocence; while to the heated imagination of a world prepared by hatred to condemn her, they may have appeared confirmation strong as proof from Holy Writ.

Her brother and the three other gentlemen were involved in the same detectation. They belonged to the same faction. They had been connected most probably with her policy. If she had jested with Lady Rochford on matters which pught never to have been mentioned - if she had allowed Weston to make love to her, and talked to Nerris about "dead men's shoes"—she had lost the protection of the presumption of innocence which forms a shield round genuine modesty. The Peers who found her guilty may thus have given their verdict without wilful perjury. The law allowed prisoners under charge of treason no counsel. There were no witnesses, but only written depositions which they were themselves called to answer offhand; and a Court which started with a ready-made presumption of guilt would be unlikely, in a defence made under such conditions, to find much to shake their opinions. If there was intentional treachery anywhere it was in Cromwell, but he, too, may have been deceived by his wishes.

The King evidently believed the whole charge — the adultory, the incest, the poisoning of Catherine, the intended poisoning of Mary and the Duke of Richmond. Anne's execution was not necessary for his release from her — for, as it was, a divorce was pronounced — but the assumption of her guilt was a salve to his conscience. It was a saliefaction to him to see in the woman who had become a burden to him a monetar of wickedness. There was nothing to suggest a doubt to him of what one of the secused parties confessed, of charges which every one about him declared to be true, and to which he himself was but too willing to give credit. Chapuye, who half believed Anne to be innocent, who spoke with cynical contempt of Henry's parade of his horns, who knew all that had passed about Jane Seymour, yet continued to endeavour to promote his marriage with the Infanta; the French ambassador, equally, had another candidate for his hand, and unscrupulous as were the politicians of the sixteenth contury in such matters, it is impossible that they could have suspected him of deliberate and destardly murder.

The country was clearly satisfied. Anne Boleya was supposed in England to have been innocent only when Elizabeth had become the national idol. Any passing misgivings were dispelled by the speeches at the executions, which under every hypothesis, except that the sufferers were really guilty of some crimp or other, remain hard to be accounted for.

But Chapuys' story is not yet completed.

Parliament had been called to revise what had been done, and to make the changes in the disposition of the succession which had been rendered necessary by the illegatimatizing the Princess Elizabeth. In default of issue from his marriage with Jane Seymour, the King intended to actile the crown on the Duke of Richmond.¹

The Duke became dangerously ill. Slow poison, so the impassioned world imagined, had actually been administered to him by the unhappy Anne, and he sank so fast, and was so evidently dying, that the intention was exchanged for a provision enabling the King to dispose the succession in his will. The King himself was solemnly thanked for having complied with the request of the Peers and Council, and

PENNIST -

I Le qual pour tout certain il entendoit de faire son successour, et pensoit. Il en maladie no fut survenu le faire declairer par le Parlement. — Chapuya è l'Empereur, 20 Juillet.

taken another wife. In conformity with Crammer's sentence, the marriage with Anne Boleyn was declared to have been void from the first, and Elizabeth in consequence to be a bestard.

The statute having been silent as to the cause, conjecture has been busy to discover the nature of the obstacle.

Of the two explanations already offered by Chapuya, he now pronounced positively for the second, not, however without implying that the Parliament might, if it had pleased, have proceeded on the connection with Norris, or on the previous marriage with the Earl of Northumberland.

"The statute constituting the concubine's daughter the lawful heir to the crown has been repealed," he said, "and she has been declared bastard, not as being the daughter of Mr. Norris, as might have been more honourably alleged, but because the marriage between the King and the concubine was in itself illegitimate, the King having previously had carnal knowledge of the said concubine's sister. For this cause the Archbishop of Canterbury gave a sentence of divorce a day or two before the execution. There was no need of it, for death and the sword were to divorce her speedily enough and absolutely enough. Or if they chose to have it so, they might have found a fairer pretext in her having been already married to another husband who was still alive. But God has been pleased to discover a greater and worse than inexcusable abomination, insumuch as the King could allege ignorance neither of law nor of fact. God grant that here may be the end of all his follies."1

I Le statut declaiment princesses legitime heretiere la fille de la concubine a este revequé et elle declaire bastarde non point comme fille de Mr. Norris comme se pouvoit plus honnestement dire, mais pour avoir este le mariage entre ladiete concubine et le diet Roy lingitume, a cause qu'il avoit cogneu chamellement la exur de la diete concubine; pour laquelle cause l'Archevosque de Canterbury ang ou deux jours avant que ladiete concubine fui executée donna et prefera la sentence de divorce, de quoy er mus sçaves trop misuix n'estoit grand besoign, pulsque l'epec et la mort les avoit prochamement et absolument divorties; et pulsque anney la rouleient faire, le presente eust este plus nommets d'elleguer qu'elle avoit

This is a positive assertion of great consequence, and is a strong confirmation, if it does not amount to more, of the conjecture which has been already ventured by Lingard and other writers. The words of the statute to which Chapuys refers, however, are these:—

God of late of His infinite goodness, from whom no secret things can be LM, bath caused to be brought to light evident and spen knowledge of certain just, true, and lawful impediments, naknown at the making of the late Act, and since that time confused by the Lady Acea, before the most Reverence Father in God, Thomas, Archbishop of Cantarbury, sitting judicially for the same, by the which it plainly appears that the said marriage was never good nor constraint to the law.

The Lady Anne could not be said to have confessed the King's guilt with her sister; and to Chapuys' account there is another equally positive to be opposed.

"The same day, May 17, in the afternoon," says the same contemporary chronicler from whom I have already quoted," "at a solemn court kept at Lambeth by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury and the Dootors of the Laws, the King was divorced from his wife Queen Anne, and there, at the same court, was a privy contract approved that she had made to the Earl of Northumberland after the King's time. And so she was discharged, and was never lawful Queen of England."

The proceedings in Parliament were secret. It does not appear from what source Chapuya derived his information, or why his version should be more accurate than the chronicler's, unless it be that in so dark a story the most unfavourable interpretation is the more probable. It is not easy to suppose that the King, having confessedly other grounds to go upon, should have gone out of his way to expose his own wickedness. It is, at least, possible that Chapuya was retailing a rumour which was growing popular este mariar à antre ancoras vivent. Mais Dieu a voulu descouvrir plangrande abbomination qu'est plus que inexcusable, actendu qu'il an poult alleguer ignorance seque juris neque facti. Dieu veuille que telle soit le fin de toutes ses folles. —Chapuys à Granvelle, S Juillet.

1 See note, p. 651, and note, p. 656.

among the Catholics, as reflecting infamy on persons whom they detested.

Whether the King's connection with Mary Boleyn was or was not the occasion of the divorce, is independent of course of the further question, whether such a connection ever really existed. Mary Boleyn may have been Henry's mistress, yet the chronicler be right in his explanation of the divorce. I will therefore add a few words on the general evidence for the truth of the charge.

The haison, if real, must have taken place previous to 1521. In the January of that year Mary Boloyn married Sir Henry Carey, and no one pretends that it occurred after she became Carey's wife. Nothing was known about it at the time, nor was it ever heard of till many years after, during the agitation of the first divorce.

In 1527, however, a draft was sketched of a dispensation enabling Henry to marry a second wife, for which it was intended to apply to the Pope, and which appears, to say the least of it, suspicious. The King applies for permission to marry, cum quaeumque alia muliere, etsi illa talis sit quae alias cum also matrimonium contracerit, dummodo illud carnali copula non consummaverit etiamsi tibi (the Pope is supposed to be addressing the King), alias secundo vel remotleri gradu consungulalitatis aut primo affinitatis ex quocunque hicito seu illicito coitu conjuncta, dummodo relicta fratris tui non fuerit, ac etiamsi cognatione spirituali aut legali tibi conjuncta extitorit, et impedimentum publica honestatis justitisve subsistat, etc.

The dispensations granted to Emmanuel of Portugal, who married two sisters and afterwards his niece, may have nearly resembled this. Legal documents of the kind wars made as broad as possible to cover all questions which might afterwards be raised. The phrase, however, "licito seu illicito coitu" is certainly remarkable, and may be fairly supposed to have special reference to the circumstances of the person whom the King desired to marry. If this was the case, the preceding paragraph, "etsi fila talis sit quasilias cum also matrimonium contraxerit," etc., may have had a personal application also, and may have related to Anne's precontract with young Percy.

But here we are met again with the antecedent unlikelihood, indisputably very strong, that Henry, who was applying for a separation from Queen Catherine on conscientious grounds, should have himself supplied the Pope with an unanswerable ground for refusal. How could be ask the Pope at the same breath to admit a doubt of the legality of his marriage with his brother's wife, and demand to be allowed to marry a woman to whom he stood in the same virtual relation?

While the divorce controversy was in progress the story became current among the friars about the Court. The scandal was extended to Lady Boleyn, and it was whispered that Anne herself was the King's daughter. In 1532, Father Peto, an advocate of Queen Catherine, mentioned it under this form to Sir George Throgmorton, who had opposed the divorce in Parliament, and Throgmorton boasted to a party of his friends that he had thrown it in the teeth of Henry himself. The King, he told them, had once begun apon the subject of the divorce with him. said he had replied that "if his Highness did marry Queen Anne his conscience would be more troubled at length, for that it was thought he had meddled both with the mother and the sister." The King had answered, "Never with the mother." Cromwell, standing by, had added, "Nor with the sister neither, so put that out of your mind"

Henry permitted and encouraged singular plainness of speech. It is possible that Throgmorton may have really spoken to him in these terms, but when the words were reported to the King, and he was questioned about them, he did not attempt to maintain the truth of the conversation. He had been boasting merely to his friends, he said, "that they might note him as a man that dared speak for the commonwealth."

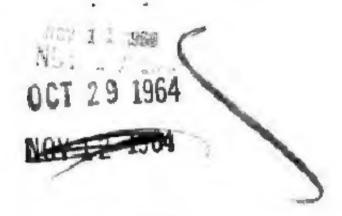

The next authority whom Sanders and subsequent writers followed, is Reginald Pole. Pole, when he had composed his celebrated book against Henry VIII, sent it first in MS, to the King. In this version the story is not mentioned, and Pole speaks of Henry as having lived an unblemished life down to the time of his acquaintance with Anne. He could not have meant this in strictness, for the intrigue of which the Duke of Richmond was the result was notorious, and had never been concealed. Clearly, however, he acquitted him of anything like general profigacy, yet in the year following, when he gave his book to the world, he inserted this new charge in terms of peculiar offensiveness. The inference is that he had not heard of it before, and had learnt it in the interval. Yet if he had learnt it on producible authority - especially if Chapuya' account could be proved, and if Parliament had pronounced Henry divorced from Anne on this ground - the question presents itself why Paul III, made no use of so tremendous an argument when it would have told with such overwhelming force in his favour? Why, when he at last pronounced his long-delayed sentence, and suramed up, as the occasion of it, the long catalogue of Henry's enormities, did he omit the one charge which of all others would have carried the opinion of Europe in his favour?

The argument from the Pope's silence, and from the absence of all mention of the Mary Boleyn connection in every authoritative document where it would most have been expected, has always appeared to me so weighty as to overbalance floating scandal, rhetorical invective, and conclusions drawn by inference from ambiguous legal documents. The story may have been true, and if it was true it was peculiarly disgraceful, but it is not proved. In my own opinion the balance of probability is the other way, but those who believe it will find their case strengthened by the deliberate words of the Imperial ambassador.

Gougle

NOV 2 6 1964

GIHUULAILO

Open Will Room

DA315 .F95 1895 v.2

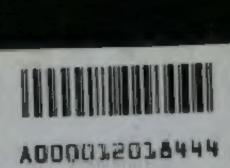

14192

Foude

gland

PENN STATE

himsel by Google